Mr. ATKINS. Has the Department estimated for it and asked for this publication?

Mr. DEERING. I so understand it. I was told by the Commissioner of the General Land Office that this republication should be made.

Mr. ATKINS. Has the gentleman any letter from the Interior Department favoring this appropriation?

Mr. DEERING. I have been in communication and consultation on the subject with the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. ATKINS. Is there any letter addressed to the Speaker?

Mr. DEERING. Not that I am aware of.

Mr. ATKINS. Then it is merely a private letter.

Mr. DEERING. It was simply an interview with the Commissioner of the General Land Office in which I received this information. He states they have the lithograph stones and other facilities for publishing the maps as heretofore.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Iowa whether his amendment looks simply to the enlargement of a publication already authorized by existing law?

Mr. DEERING. It is authorized by existing law.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it not a new publication? Is it authorized by law? The point I make is that it is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asked the gentleman from Iowa on that very point, and he replied that this is a publication already authorized by law.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman point out the law?

Mr. NEAL. If the gentleman from Tennessee will permit me I will read the statute.

Mr. ATKINS. I understand this is an entirely new publication.

Mr. DEERING. I wish to restate that the General Land Office already has the stone for lithographing, and all the facilities used heretofore in the publication of this identical map which has been sent into every part of our country.

Mr. NEAL. I will read section 3781 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 3781. The Congressional Printer may contract for the lithographing of the maps of the several States and Territories accompanying the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, except the connected map of the public lands east and west of the Mississippi River, accompanying the annual report of the Commissioner for the year 1862, with the additions thereto which may be made from time to time.

It is under this section of the Revised Statutes that it is proposed to authorize an additional issue of these maps or the publication of additional copies. I do not suppose there is a member of Congress who has been here during one session who has not had applications for these maps for public libraries, schools, and other institutions of public interest.

Mr. DEERING. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. There has been no continuous appropriation at all for this map. If I understand it, it is a map which has been published by order of Congress, but there has been no continuous appropriation for it for the last two years.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Tennessee to say that no appropriation was made last year for this purpose?

Mr. ATKINS. None at all.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I would say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I would be very much in favor of this extra printing, but I find in the Revised Statutes that section 3795 absolutely prohibits it. I think these cannot be printed except by joint resolution. I ask that the section be read.

The Clerk read section 3795 of the Revised Statutes, as follows:

All propositions in either House of Congress for printing extra copies of documents, the cost of which exceeds $100, shall be by concurrent resolution, which shall, upon its transmission from either House, be immediately referred to the Committee on Printing of the House to which it is sent.

Mr. DEERING. I would say that I do not understand that that applies to this kind of printing, but simply to the printing of public documents.

Mr. ATKINS. The last appropriation made for this purpose was for the year ending June 30, 1875.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that this amendment looks to a publication that rests upon appropriations made from year to year, and that there is no dispute of the statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee, and that there has been no such appropriations made since 1875; for that reason the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I would ask the Chair to read himself the section from the Revised Statutes which was read by the gentleman from Michigan in a low voice.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no objection to hearing it again, but the Chair assures the gentleman from Michigan that he has already heard it.

Mr. CONGER. Then I desire to say that the statute says that these maps shall be published from time to time, but it does not say that they shall be published yearly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would have no objection to a discussion on the point of order, but the point of order has been ruled on; the Chair sustained the point of order.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

Indian Office:

For the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,000; five clerks of class 4; seven clerks of class 3; one stenographer, at $1,600; eleven clerks of class 2; ten clerks of class 1; ten clerks, at $1,000 each; eight copyists, at $900 each; two assistant messengers; and two laborers; in all, $75,160.

Mr. SCALES. I move in lines 1594 and 1595 to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,500;" so as to make the pay of the chief clerk of the Indian Office $2,500.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order that there is no law authorizing the increase of the salary of this officer; it is an increase of the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. SCALES. Here is an appropriation for the payment of the salary of this officer, and I propose to make the appropriation larger.

Mr. ATKINS. There is no law authorizing the payment to this officer of a higher salary than $2,000; that is the point of order I make.

Mr. BLOUNT. The appropriation bills are the law in regard to these salaries until they are changed.

Mr. ATKINS. There is no law fixing the salary of the chief clerk of this bureau.

Mr. BLOUNT. But, as I understand it, the law fixes it at $2,000, and it must stand there until it is changed.

Mr. SCALES. I think the amendment is in order. I put it upon this ground: there is no existing law providing that the pay of the chief clerk of the Indian Bureau shall be $2,000. I do not change the law as to paying him; I simply change the amount. The law authorizes now a salary of $2,000. I offer an amendment to make it $2,500. I think a similar thing has been done here numbers of times; I think it has been done during the progress of this very bill; I am certain that it has been done heretofore on other bills.

Mr. ATKINS. The admissions of the gentleman from North Carolina are sufficient; it needs no further argument on the subject to show that this amendment is not in order.

Mr. BAKER. On the point of order I desire to have read section 169 of the Revised Statutes, to show this fact: that in respect to the compensation of the chief clerks in the various departments there is no law fixing their compensation, but the Revised Statutes provide expressly that they shall be paid from year to year by Congress, plainly showing that this does not change existing law, but is carrying out existing law in order to offer such amendments as are proposed here. In reference to the merits of the case, of course I have nothing to say.

Mr. ATKINS. The appropriations are fixed by law and are made from year to year.

Mr. BAKER. Let the Clerk read section 169 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 169. Each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law, and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employés, and at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

Mr. BAKER. The point I make is this: the law as I find it in the Revised Statutes expressly requires that the compensation shall be fixed by each Congress from year to year. The amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina is not out of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. The section of the Revised Statutes to which the gentleman refers is the act of 1856. That is the law; and in addition to that, there is a law fixing the pay of all the employés of the Government, of these clerks as well as others. There are many things in the statutes which are incongruous. The law in reference to these officers has been incorporated in the Revised Statutes, and has been subsequently changed by the appropriation bills themselves. The law of 1856, which the gentleman cites, has been departed from in the very Revised Statutes themselves.

Mr. ATKINS. Following the very enacting clause of this bill is this:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, for the objects hereinafter expressed.

That was in the appropriation bill of last year, of two years ago, and of three years ago, which bills fixed $2,000 as the full compensation of this officer.

Mr. SCALES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SCALES. Does the gentleman take the position that there is no such thing as increasing the salary of this officer at any time and under any circumstances?

Mr. ATKINS. Why, sir, of course it can be changed by an act of Congress.

Mr. SCALES. Can it be done on an appropriation bill, I mean? Can the Committee on Appropriations report an increase of his salary?

Mr. ATKINS. My judgment is that it would be liable to a point of order, if any member choose to make it.

Mr. SCALES. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] had reported it from the committee of which he was chairman, would it then be liable to a point of order?

Mr. ATKINS. I think it would?

Mr. SCALES, I have not heretofore had that idea in regard to this matter. I stated when I was first up that I thought all that was necessary was for the officer to be authorized by law. Is this officer a legal officer? Is he authorized by the law as it now exists? He is, that is not denied. That being so, then I thought that the object of the appropriation bill was to pay him a suitable salary. I did not know that we were confined in our action by the fact of what he had heretofore received.

Mr. ATKINS. His salary was fixed, according to my recollection, in the Kellogg bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Coming from the Committee on Civil Service Reform.

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. In the Forty-third Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Whatever may be the criticism to which the practice of this House under this rule may properly be subjected, the present occupant of the chair has no desire to infringe upon that practice. The salary of this officer is certainly fixed by law in the appropriation bill passed last year, which is still the existing law. Under the practice which, so far as the Chair is informed, has always prevailed here, the Chair feels compelled to sustain the point of order as good against this amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

Pension Office:

For compensation of the Commissioner of Pensions, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,250; medical referee, $2,250; twenty-six clerks of class 4, (five of whom may act as chiefs of division, and shall each receive $300 additional;) fifty-two clerks of class 3; eighty-four clerks of class 2; one hundred and thirty-two clerks of class 1; ten clerks, at $1,000 each; one skilled mechanic, at $1,200; thirty copyists, at $900 each; one engineer, at $1,200; one assistant engineer, at $1,000; one messenger and twelve assistant messengers; and for eight laborers and two watchmen; in all, $472,600.

Mr. NEAL. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "one hundred and thirty-two" and inserting "one hundred and fifty" as the number of clerks of class 1.

It is known to every member of the Forty-fifth Congress that prior to the passage of what is known as the arrears of pensions act the Pension Office was overcrowded with business; claims pended there for months before they could be disposed of, by reason of the insufficient clerical force.

Since the passage of that act there has been a very avalanche of pension claims thrown into that department, so that it is substantially smothered by them. Claims which are now on file in that office cannot be disposed of for a year to come, unless the clerical force be increased. Now if these claimants are entitled to pensions, then they ought to have them at the earliest possible moment. If they are not entitled to pensions, they ought to know it.

In the second place, there is no economy in not providing a sufficient clerical force for all these offices; none whatever. If the increase is now made, and next year it should be found that the number of clerks was too great, then it can be reduced. But until this pressure of business is removed there ought to be enough clerical force in that department to enable it promptly to pass upon every claim that is filed. I appeal to every friend of the soldier to support this amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I am very much astonished indeed at the introduction of this amendment; I cannot understand it. Has the gentleman any official communication from the Commissioner of Pensions on this subject?

Mr. NEAL. I have no other information than the fact that the claims of pensioners in my district, which have been filed there for a long period, cannot be taken up and passed upon, because there is not a sufficient clerical force to enable the Commissioner to do so. I am not the mouth-piece of the Commissioner; I am not speaking for him. I am speaking for those persons who have claims there and who are entitled to the bounties of this Government.

Mr. ATKINS. It is to be presumed, with all due deference to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NEAL,] that the Commissioner of Pensions knows the needs of his office fully as well as does the gentleman from Ohio. I will state to this House that the Committee on Appropriations are acting in accordance with the views and wishes of the Commissioner of Pensions upon this identical provision which the gentleman proposes to amend. The Commissioner of Pensions himself told me not more than six weeks ago, when we were maturing this bill, that he was perfectly satisfied with the force provided in this bill. He himself came before the Committee on Appropriations and revised the estimates which had been originally submitted in the Book of Estimates. He was perfectly content with the number of clerks proposed in this bill.

But, Mr. Chairman, in addition to this it will be remembered that in the bill providing for the arrearages of pensions fifty additional clerks were provided for the Commissioner of Pensions. Now, I say there is no necessity for any such increase of force as is now proposed; and if there were such necessity it seems to me the Commissioner of Pensions ought to have made it known officially to the House or to the Committee on Appropriations, which he has not done. I will state further that the Commissioner informed me he believed he would be able in a short time to dispense with some of the force he already has.

Mr. NEAL. Are not the fifty clerks already provided temporary clerks merely, and intended only to bring up the work on these arrears of pensions?

Mr. ATKINS. Very well.

Mr. NEAL. What I ask in my amendment is such an increase of force as will enable the Commissioner to dispose of original claims.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman asks an increase of force which the Commissioner himself does not ask. That is the point I make.

Mr. NEAL. The pensioners of the country ask for it.

The question being taken on Mr. NEAL'S amendment, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 48, noes 68.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend by inserting before the words "chief clerk," in line 1608, the words "deputy commissioner, $2,400," and by changing the amount of appropriation in the paragraph to $475,000.

Mr. Chairman, I must be perfectly frank with the House. In offering this amendment I do not expect any one to conclude that it is not liable to a point of order. It is liable to such a point; and if any gentleman desires to make the point he can rise in his place and do so.

I offer the amendment because I believe that this additional officer is absolutely necessary. The Commissioner of Pensions says that he cannot possibly get along unless this additional office is provided. He states that he and the chief clerk are engaged almost the entire time; that they are at the office the entire day and frequently during much of the night; and he tells me that he is obliged to be there on Sundays in order to keep the business up. As I understand that this additional officer is absolutely essential to the running of this bureau, I trust the House will adopt it, though I frankly admit that it is liable to the point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether the pressure of business requiring this additional officer is not temporary in its character; and if so, would it not be well to provide that this office shall continue but one year?

Mr. ATKINS. In response to the gentleman from Georgia, I will say it is possibly true that this officer may not be necessary for more than one year; and if he should be the office can be continued in the next appropriation bill. I have no objection to the limitation which the gentleman suggests.

Mr. BLOUNT. I suggest the addition of the words "to continue for one year."

Mr. ATKINS. I accept the modification.

The amendment, as modified, was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows, under the heading "Pension Office:"

For actual and necessary expenses of clerks detailed to investigate suspected frauds and attempts at fraud, as provided by law, $40,000.

Mr. MCMAHON. I move to amend by adding after the paragraph just read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sections 4771, 4772, and 4773 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, providing for biennial examinations of pensioners, are hereby repealed: Provided, That the Commissioner of Pensions shall have the same power as heretofore to order special examinations, whenever in his judgment the same may be necessary, and to increase or reduce the pension according to right and justice; but in no case shall a pension be withdrawn or reduced except upon notice to the pensioner and a hearing upon sworn testimony except as to the certificate of the examining surgeon. In order to provide for the speedy payment of arrearages of pensions the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue immediately in payment thereof, as they may be adjusted, the $10,000,000 in legal-tender currency, now in the United States Treasury, kept as a special fund for the redemption of fractional currency under section 1 of joint resolution 17 of the Congress of the United States, approved July 22, 1876.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make a point of order on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point.

Mr. GARFIELD. My point is that this is new legislation. It proposes a mode of raising revenue and the issue of obligations of the United States not germane to anything in the bill, and in this respect changes the existing law, which limits the issue of the legal-tender notes of the United States.

Mr. MCMAHON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Before I discuss the point of order I think he will discover the $10,000,000 I propose to issue is considered as a part of the $346,000,000 outstanding. It is not a new issue. It is simply untying money tied up in the United States Treasury.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask to have the clause again read.

Mr. MCMAHON. Very well; but I desire at the proper time to be heard on the point of order.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now, Mr. Chairman, my point of order is equally strong against that. Here is a disposition of all the legal-tender notes now in existence. A portion of them is held by the law to provide for the redemption of mutilated notes as they are brought in; another portion is held by the law for the redemption and cancellation of the scrip or fractional currency as it is brought in; and the general law beside regulates the volume. Now, an infraction of either of these laws in relation to the management of the United States notes is such a change of the general statute as though it were a new issue altogether. Of course it is clearly understood by everybody that our present laws relating to that subject are, first, the resumption law and the reserves provided under it, and the limitations placed upon greenbacks; and, second, the two laws I have named; and these laws are all a part of the same general legislation which limits and restricts the active circulating volume of legal-tender notes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. EWING having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced the passage of a joint resolution (S. R. No. 17) authorizing the printing of a portrait of the late Joseph Henry to accompany the memorial volume heretofore ordered; in which concurrence was requested.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor on his point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, what I have to say on the point of order, that this amendment, as now offered, compels a new provision to meet the necessities of redeeming the fractional currency. It therefore breaks in upon the established order of the law which regulates the resumption of specie payments, which regulates the redemption of these canceled or ordered-to-be-canceled notes, and which regulates the whole matter of our circulating medium. If this can go on we can break through the whole resumption business and it will be in order. On every account this is out of order according to the rendition of the rule we have had hitherto. It is not germane.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question, and it is this: whether at the last session of Congress we did not pass a law authorizing the reissue of these Treasury notes to prevent their destruction and to authorize their reissue?

Mr. GARFIELD. Not relating to this at all. The last Congress did provide, to make more clear what was believed generally to be the meaning of the resumption law, that the volume prescribed below which the reduction should go might be reissued was to be redeemed, but that was understood to be a clearer declaration of what was declared to be the meaning of the law. This is breaking over the point of order, and it is clearly a change of all the laws relating to the volume of the United States notes.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered contains several distinct provisions. I admit that it will change existing law in several ways, but it is germane to the bill, and, as I can show, will retrench expenditures, and therefore comes within the rule of the House.

The biennial examination of all pensioners of the United States is a peremptory provision of law. By law they are compelled to submit to it in September in every odd-numbered year. The coming September will be the month in which these biennial examinations must take place. They take place as to every pensioner whose disability is not of such a permanent character as to render an examination useless.

I propose to repeal the law making those examinations peremptory, and the proposition is germane for this reason: the clause that we have under consideration is a clause appropriating $40,000 for the detection of frauds on the Government of the United States by persons upon the pension-roll who are supposed not to be entitled to be there. Now, how does the Government of the United States protect itself? By two kinds of examinations: first, by biennial examinations which, as a matter of course, occur every two years; and, secondly, by special examinations, for which we are now about to appropriate $40,000. The biennial examinations, the Commissioner of Pensions himself says, are of little or no value to the Government of the United States. I need not now do more than refer to the report which he made last December to the Forty-fifth Congress, and which I had read in that body when this question was up, in which he recommends the repeal of these three sections because they are an expense to the Government of the United States without any corresponding benefit. Besides the useless expense to the Government they are a great inconvenience to the needy pensioner, who undergoes some expense to submit to the farce of a mere formal examination by a surgeon who is his neighbor and friend, and generally reports him still unsound. As a matter of fact, most pensioners whose disabilities have existed to this date are probably permanently disabled, and their pensions are more likely to be increased than diminished.

It is an expense, Mr. Chairman, which must necessarily take place, and therefore this amendment necessarily retrenches in cutting them off; and the Government of the United States, so long as this statute stands as it does, must pay one dollar under the recent law (it was two formerly) for each examination. Now, I have a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions which shows how much this has cost in times past, which the Clerk will please read.

APRIL 3, 1878.

DEAR SIR: I did not get your note of the 1st, requesting the information which I had before promised and forgotten to send, as to the expense of biennial examinations. Cost in 1875 and 1876, $161,359.04; 1877 and 1878, $153,898.80. If the biennial examinations are continued they will gradually decrease in number and, of course, in cost

I am, very truly, yours,

J. W. BENTLY.

Hon. J A. McMAHON,
House of Representatives.

Mr. McMAHON. As the law has been recently changed so as to allow only $1 for examination, the expense of course will not hereafter be more than one-half of the above sum, and will gradually diminish.

I am sorry to see my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD]—in view of the speech he made the other day—interposing any point of order on a matter for the benefit of the soldiers. And I desire to say that the amendment, so far as it concerns examinations and investigations, has been submitted to the Commissioner of Pensions, and it is almost in the identical language in which he requests the repeal to be made, in his report sent to Congress in December, 1878. I have put in a provision for the benefit of the pensioner which I think every gentleman on that side, when the time comes, will vote for along with gentlemen on this side; and that is, that when you make these special investigations of claims of pensioners you shall not drop a pensioner without notice to him; that he shall not, under the former practice of the Pension Office, be deprived of his little pittance simply on a letter of some irresponsible or unknown enemy of his who lies concealed at home, and whose name is withheld at the Pension Office; that when he has once obtained a pension on sworn testimony, that pension shall not be taken away on unsworn testimony and without a hearing. I want the pensioner to stand upon the same ground as every other man who has a right or a claim; that when his claim is submitted to adjudication he shall have notice and the chance to have the testimony, whatever it may be, taken on oath. I have excepted, however, that part of the testimony consisting of the certificate of the examining surgeon, and have done so at the request of the Commissioner of Pensions himself. I do not wish to interfere with special examinations. By my amendment the Government is fully protected. But the honest pensioner is protected as well. He should not be overlooked.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me, I wish to say that I made no objection to that clause. That is not the clause there is any doubt about; and we have a right to demand a division.

Mr. McMAHON. Not on the question of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I only make the point of order on the other part.

Mr. McMAHON. You cannot make the point of order on one part merely of my amendment. It is offered as one proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly I can. I demand a division and make a point of order on one portion of the amendment.

Mr. McMAHON. I say it is not competent to demand a division in order to make the point of order. The gentleman is entitled to a division so as to have a separate vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that the point which the gentlemen are discussing is now pending. The point of order, as the Chair understands, is made against the amendment, and that point of order is now being discussed.

Mr. McMAHON. The point of order must be made against the entire amendment and not against so much of the amendment as the gentleman chooses to pick out. I admit the gentleman has the right, when the amendment comes to be voted on, to demand a separate vote on every separate proposition, if the amendment can be divided under the rules.

Now let me come to the other point, the particular point to which the gentleman makes his exception. I confess to some surprise at hearing my friend make a point of order on this question, so peculiarly interesting to the disabled soldiers. If I was overturning any of the financial schemes of the Secretary of the United States Treasury at this particular time, or cutting into the policy of the republican party on this question and endangering resumption, I might understand his objection. But I do not propose to alter or change the existing volume of currency one particle. I have been appealed to by gentlemen holding peculiar, extreme views on this question to add more to this proposition than I have embraced in it; but I only wanted to put in it that which I thought was entirely unobjectionable to gentlemen on either side of the House so as to insure its passage. And I think that with the ten millions involved in this portion of the amendment the Secretary will find enough in his capacious treasury to pay all the arrearages.

When we have ten millions of idle money in the United States Treasury which ought to be issued and paid out, money which is doing the Government no good and the people no good—I say when the soldiers of this country have been notified there is, or will be, a deficiency in the United States Treasury, so that they cannot get their arrearages of pension unless there be additional taxation or an additional issue of bonds, I am surprised to see the gentleman from Ohio get up and make the point of order against the soldiers of the country to prevent them from speedily receiving these $10,000,000, which is only a part of what is due to them. I supposed the gentleman owed an allegiance to them far superior to the allegiance he might owe to Wall street or the capitalists of the country. I supposed they were a class whose claims he would recognize prior to those of the Wall street interest. I make use of this language advisedly, for there is no portion of the people of this country interested in keeping this money locked up in the Treasury except those who are interested in mercilessly contracting the currency of the United States so as to make money dear and harder to get, and enhance thereby the extent of their wealth.

Let me give a little history how these $10,000,000 came into the United States Treasury. Under the resumption law of January, 1875, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to redeem, as quickly as possible, in silver coin the outstanding fractional currency. Nothing was done under that law for some time.

In April, 1876, we passed a law which ordered the Secretary of the Treasury to proceed with the coinage of subsidiary silver coin and to issue it in redemption of the fractional currency as rapidly as practicable. He began to coin, and partial redemption took place. Then they came to us who were then in Congress and said that between the operation of putting out the silver coin and calling in the currency there was a famine among the people and a scarcity of small change, and something must be done to put out the silver change more speedily than it could be done under the slow process of redemption under the first section of the resumption law.

By a joint resolution, approved on the 22d of July, 1876, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to do what? To exchange $10,000,000 of subsidiary silver coin for $10,000,000 of legal-tender money. The first section of that resolution said that these $10,000.000 of legal-tender notes, when so exchanged and put into the Treasury, should be kept in the Treasury of the United States, separate and apart from all the other moneys of the United States, and should not be reissued except for the redemption of the fractional currency. Now what was done by Mr. Sherman and his predecessor? After the fractional currency came in for redemption, as much of it did after these ten millions of legal-tender money came into the Treasury, did he redeem in legal-tender money? That he did not is plain from the figures, for the report of the Treasury shows that only twenty-five millions of fractional currency have been presented and redeemed. Yet the same report shows that there is now outstanding thirty-nine millions of subsidary silver coin. Thus every dollar of fractional currency has been redeemed, as the Secretary may have had a right to do under the resumption law, in silver coin, and not one dollar of it in these legal-tenders.

How did this happen? By a violation of the spirit of the law, or joint resolution No. 17, which was never intended to lock up permanently these ten millions of legal-tender dollars; by the institution of a little private contraction scheme of the then Secretary of the Treasury, outside of law and against the interests of the people. And the result is now that as fractional currency is presented for redemption in very small sums, there is no possible chance to reissue this ten millions except in some way similar to that indicated by my amendment. And to what better use could we put this idle money than the payment, immediately, of the long-delayed debt to the disabled soldier? The objection of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that fractional currency may be presented if this is paid out, with nothing in the Treasury in which to redeem it, is not sound. The amount of fractional currency outstanding—lost or in existence—is only fifteen millions. Of this it is estimated that not less than eight millions have been lost or destroyed. These figures will be found in the Treasurer's report. Thus under all circumstances we will have presented hereafter not more than eight or ten millions for redemption. The first section of the resumption law authorizes the redemption in silver coin. The third section of joint resolution No. 17, heretofore referred to, fixes the limit of subsidiary silver coin at $50,000,000. As we have issued only thirty-nine millions so far, it will be seen that, under the law as it now stands, we have eleven millions of silver coin with which to redeem this eight or ten millions of fractional currency yet in existence, if any considerable portion of it will ever be presented.

So far from my proposition being one to overturn the resumption legislation of the party on the other side of the House and alter the resumption policy of the Administration, it is in strict accord with law and in no way conflicts with the proper interpretation of the resumption scheme.

Now I hold in my hand the Treasurer's last report, and on page 4 of that report I find that on the 30th day of September, 1878, there was stated among the "currency assets of the United States" a special fund of $10,000,000 set apart for the redemption of fractional currency. This ten millions of legal-tender notes constitute, Mr. Chairman, a part and parcel of the $346,000,000 which are now reported to be outstanding. This is really below any limit fixed by law. We are under no obligation of faith to the bondholder or any one else to keep any portion of this three hundred and forty-six millions locked up.

I want to impress upon the Chair and the House that I am not seeking to inflate the currency beyond the amount fixed by law, but I am doing one thing, I am proposing to alter a law which was construed, if not enacted, in the interest of capitalists. Ought we not to do what I propose? This amendment is in the interest of economy; and it is in the interest of the Government and the people. I hold in my hand the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury sent to the Committee of Ways and Means, of which my honored and distinguished colleague was a member in the last Congress, upon the probable condition of the Treasury in the incoming fiscal year in view of the passage of the bill for the payment of the arrearages of pensions. We all know that the Secretary of the Treasury did not like that law; and if rumor is to be credited he did all in his power to induce the President to veto the bill. It is well known that he and his financial clique failed in their efforts in that direction. Failing, this letter was then sent to the Committee of Ways and Means. If he could not veto the bill he hoped to make it unpopular. He says in the concluding portion of it, after complaining that there would be a deficiency of $27,000,000:

> It would thus appear that the sinking fund must be entirely ignored and twenty-seven millions be provided for by additional legislation.
> This may be accomplished by the imposition of some new tax adequate for the purpose, or by authorizing the money to be borrowed upon 4 per cent. bonds, which, in the present state of the market, can be sold at par.
> As new taxes cannot be immediately productive, it is recommended that authority be given to raise the amount necessary by the sale of 4 per cent. bonds described in the acts of July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871.

"The money may be borrowed upon bonds," says Mr. Sherman. Nothing seems to delight this financier like the issuing of Government bonds. I think that the dying words of Mr. John Sherman, if his ruling passion asserts itself in death, will be "Borrow money upon Government bonds for the tombstone above my remains." Borrow money upon more bonds! Impose new taxes, Mr. Chairman! We have three hundred and odd million dollars of available assets in gold, silver, and currency in the Treasury, and yet the gentleman wants to have new taxes imposed or new bonds issued.

I say that there is in the Treasury $10,000,000 which is a part of what is authorized by law to be put in circulation. It should be put out. The purpose for which it was to be kept in the United States Treasury has long since passed away. Let us impose no new taxes until necessary; let us put out no more bonds. Let us issue this amount of money which at 4 per cent. would result in a saving of $400,000 annually, which would be the interest on $10,000,000 of new bonds.

Mr. HASKELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MCMAHON. Certainly.

Mr. HASKELL. If the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] prevails, will it still be in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury under the law to redeem these pieces of fractional currency that may come in?

Mr. MCMAHON. Unquestionably, and for this reason, as I said a while ago, if the gentleman had attended to my argument a little more closely——

Mr. HASKELL. I attended to your argument, but I failed to catch the entire language of the amendment.

Mr. MCMAHON. Section 3 of the joint resolution No. 17, under which this $10,000,000 is to be kept in the Treasury, says that the limit of subsidiary coin shall be $50,000,000. We have issued only $39,000,000; that leaves a margin of $11,000,000, which under the resumption is specifically to be applied to the redemption of fractional currency.

Mr. HASKELL. I understand that. I simply wanted to know whether the amendment would repeal that provision of the law which allows the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange subsidiary silver coin for whatever there might be of fractional currency coming in.

Mr. MCMAHON. It does not repeal that law, for the reason that the authority to exchange subsidiary silver coin for fractional currency is a part of the specie-resumption bill, section 1. My friend has been here long enough to know that we have never been able to repeal that law. The first clause of that bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem the fractional currency in subsidiary silver coin. It is a subsequent law (joint resolution No. 17) which fixes the limit of subsidiary silver coin at $50,000,000.

I will beg permission to state to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who is a well-read man in financial lore, that I never knew that in the financial policy of a government subsidiary silver coin entered into the question of specie resumption. The question of subsidiary coin is an entirely independent question. It is rather token money. And the reserves of gold and silver that are proper to justify resumption are always calculated with a view to the other currency that is outstanding. His objection, therefore, is not well founded when he fears that the proposed amendment will interfere with the resumption scheme.

We have outstanding $346,000,000 of legal-tender money, (counting these ten millions in,) money which, as I said awhile ago, is authorized by law, and this amount is the basis upon which all the calculations for the specie reserve have been made. I hold in my hand the last report of the Treasurer of the United States, in which he states the coin assets of the Government. Those assets in September, 1878, amounted to $238,000,000. They are greater now, and are growing. Mr. Sherman has ample coin for his outstanding currency. He said last year, if I remember correctly, that all he needed to maintain resumption was 40 per cent. of the amount of legal-tenders outstanding, and we have more than 60 per cent. He has never taken into consideration, and does not now, and in his testimony before the Committee on Banking and Currency he expressly left out of consideration, the question of the redemption of national-bank notes; the national banks were to take care of that themselves, said he.

Why, then, should this money continue to lie idle in the Treasury? Why shall the poor soldier be compelled to wait for new bonds or new taxes? The Secretary of the Treasury tells us in this letter to the chairman of Ways and Means that for the coming fiscal year there will probably be a deficiency of $27,000,000. To meet that deficiency he says that new taxes must be imposed or more bonds be put out. Now at the present time we do not propose to impose any new taxes unless necessary. As Mr. Sherman says in this letter, no new taxes can be immediately productive. He therefore recommends that authority be given to him to raise the amount necessary by the sale of 4 per cent. bonds. Now I say instead of putting out these 4 per cent. bonds, which would be a crime while we have this money, we should put into circulation this money which is kept idle in the Treasury, the purpose for which it was to be held in reserve having passed away. It should now be put into circulation as a part of the $346,000,000 which is authorized by law. I repeat that it is a crime against the people to keep it hoarded.

Mr. BRIGHT. I understand, from the course of the gentleman's argument, that it would require no additional expense to put into circulation this amount of legal-tender currency.

Mr. MCMAHON. None at all. The money is there, only waiting to be paid out to somebody.

Mr. BRIGHT. But it would require an additional expense to put out more bonds.

Mr. MCMAHON. It would require additional clerks and officers to raise new taxes, and some additional expense to put out new bonds.

Mr. BRIGHT. And did it not require an expenditure of 1½ per cent. to put out the bonds which have been put out? Would not the additional expense of putting out bonds for this purpose amount to one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand dollars?

Mr. McMAHON. Certainly it would. Let me illustrate the economy of putting out this money in lieu of bonds. Suppose I was a merchant and wanted to borrow $100,000. Suppose there is one man who will let me have it on my notes without interest; another man who will charge me 4 per cent. interest. Would not any business man fit to run at large say that it was in the interest of economy for me to give my note to the man who would let me have the money without interest, rather than to him who would require interest? I represent that party on the floor of the House, which is anxious, when we can put out our paper without interest, within the limit of the redemption of that paper in specie, to do so rather than to put out bonds which will require the payment of interest. That is the difference between gentlemen on this side of the House and a large majority of gentlemen on the other side. I see a gentleman on the other side holding up his hand and shaking his head, [Mr. FORT.] I will not change my expression; I only said a majority of gentlemen on that side. I know he has not generally been with his party on this question.

This amendment, Mr. Chairman, is therefore clearly in order. have shown that the saving under the first branch of my amendment will be $75,000 to $100,000 biennially for a number of years to come. I am prepared to back up the proposition that it will be a large saving to the Government by the Commissioner's report and by other communications. some of which I have read. The amendment is in the interest of economy, both in the first proposition and in the last. The first proposition will save from $75,000 to $100,000 every alternate year, as we have seen, and the second proposition will save $400,000 a year which would have to be paid out annually on $10,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds.

Now, I want this question of order argued upon the theory that there is to be a deficiency and that more money is necessary to be raised, for I have here and have read the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury stating that $27,000,000 will be the deficiency for the next fiscal year. I admit that in arriving at these figures he has estimated the expense of pensions at $10,000,000 more, probably, than we have provided for or than the law authorizes. But at any rate there will be a deficiency, according to his estimate, of ten to twenty millions of dollars. If this be so, my amendment cannot but be largely in the interest of economy.

But whether there is a deficiency or not, whether the arrearages of pensions require this money to be paid or not, here is money lying idle—a part of the $346,000,000 authorized to be issued by law—a part of the money against which these enormous gold and silver reserves are held in the Treasury of the United States; here is money which was placed in the Treasury for a temporary purpose which is now passed. Why should we not pay it out in payment of the obligations of the people and the Government?

No good reason can be given, Mr. Chairman. There is no inflation in the proposition. It is a proposition to use all the money which properly belongs to the Government and the people. It is a proposition in the interest of the Government and the people. And I cannot but again express my surprise that my colleague from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] should have come to the front in opposition to it, especially as it proposes to use this money in the payment of a long-delayed debt to the disabled soldiers of the country, many of whom are in great want and distress, and who are told by a hostile Secretary of the Treasury that he has no money to pay them without new bonds or new taxes, when the Treasury is groaning under the weight of $400,000,000. The bondholder was never treated in this way.

Mr. GARFIELD. My colleague [Mr. McMAHON] has gone into the whole merits of this question on the point of order. I shall only follow his example to a very small extent. The attempt of my colleague in the speech he has just made to set himself, in comparison with me and many others on this side, as the special champion and friend of the soldier, is quite too thin a disguise to deceive anybody. He will remember, as will the House, that this side tried again and again to pass a measure authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to extend the sales of 4 per cent. bonds sufficiently to cover this whole case. We brought the House to a vote on that proposition at least twice at the last session, and but for the resistance on the other side it would have prevailed, and the soldiers would have been paid. The responsibility for not paying them rests with those who resisted that measure, not with those who proposed it. We have been selling these 4 per cent. bonds to assure resumption; and that is the law. I think it might fairly be the law that they should be issued to provide for payment of soldiers' pensions.

There is another thing which perhaps my colleague did not remember. Under a bill of last session we issued bonds to the extent of a quarter of a million of dollars to endow a private institution for the blind in one of the States of this Union, the endowment being $10,000 a year; and to keep it out of the power of Congress to repeal the act, the bonds thus issued were made a part of the bonded debt of the United States, in order to endow an institution in a State—an institution not national in its character. But gentlemen are unwilling to increase the 4 per cent. bonded debt of the United States to pay pensions already provided by law for our soldiers.

Now, I have simply made the point of order, that is all; and no man can torture anything I have said on this point of order into an unwillingness that the soldiers shall have their pensions, or that all necessary legislation shall be had to make the payment prompt and easy, and to secure all their rights. It is altogether too late in the day to tell the soldiers that gentlemen on this side who have remembered them in a thousand ways (my colleague to say the least has not remembered them in more) are not their friends.

I made this point (and I have no concealments about it) simply because I look upon this amendment as the entering wedge to a general purpose to break down the system of reserves on which the maintenance of resumption depends.

Mr. McMAHON. My colleague will permit me to ask him how the issue of $10,000,000 of the $346,000,000 authorized by law is going to break down the specie reserve which amounts to $236,000,000?

Mr. GARFIELD. That is what I am about to tell the gentleman. I say at the outset that our whole body of legislation relating to resumption makes together a connected chain; and

> Whichever link you strike,
> Tenth or ten thousandth, breaks the chain alike.

Such legislation as this tends at least to weaken that chain. Now my colleague, whose distinguished knowledge as a financier no one will question, amazed me very much by saying that the subsidiary coinage and the subsidiary currency are no part of the general problem of resumption. Why, does not my colleague know perfectly well that the subsidiary currency in the form of these scrip notes or in coin goes to make up the volume of our circulating medium just as much as greenbacks, just as much as gold? The great currency question embraces everything that circulates as money; and it will not do to say that the subsidiary coinage has nothing to do with the general proposition. It has very much to do with it. Subsidiary currency in any form circulates far more rapidly than dollar bills, and dollar bills more rapidly than five-dollar bills, and these more rapidly than tens. Just in proportion to the smallness of the denomination of the circulating money is its circulation rapid. Here was a proposition to hasten the issue of subsidiary coin. As the law first stood, the silver could only be issued on the presentation of the scrip, the silver being paid in exchange therefor. In order to facilitate the process, Congress very properly said that as there was a rush to make the exchange people might deposit greenbacks and receive silver coin in place of it, but that the greenbacks thus deposited should be held to redeem according to law the scrip as it might come in. This reserve, therefore, of which my colleague speaks, is a reserve laid away as a provision against the demand for the scrip, in place of which the silver coin has already been issued.

Mr. WARNER. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. Is it not perfectly well understood that the fractional currency, against which I understand it is claimed this $10,000,000 is held, is not out of existence, or at least that only a small part of it remains for redemption?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will answer my colleague on that subject. Estimates have been made on that subject. All agree that a certain portion of that scrip is probably destroyed and will never be presented for redemption. What that proportion is nobody knows. The amount, however, of any circulating medium which is actually destroyed is very much smaller than people suppose. I will give a single instance. There is a bank in my district which has been a bank for nearly fifty years under the old State laws, and when the new banking system was adopted this bank undertook to wind up its old concern; that is, being solvent, to redeem all of its old bills. They have gone on redeeming and redeeming, and the last time I talked with the cashier of that bank he told me that less than 2 per cent. of the whole issue, covering a period of forty years of state banking, was still out, and even then almost every week fifteen, twenty, or thirty dollars of old bills came back; showing that the destruction of outstanding circulating paper money is far less than the people suppose.

Now, the highest estimate which has been made is that perhaps $10,000,000 of the fractional scrip is destroyed and will never come in. And here is outstanding at least $15,000,000 not yet brought in. I saw the papers yesterday of a single party who took $6,000 of this scrip to the Treasury. We have sometimes six, eight, or ten thousand dollars a day brought in. The time will doubtless come when we will be satisfied we can reduce this reserve sufficient to leave enough to cover what is left outstanding and will not come in, and let the rest go into circulation. But to say now the whole of this $10,000,000 shall go into circulation, leaving none to protect this reserve, is to break down one of the stated reserves of the Government to meet its obligations.

Mr. McMAHON. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to put a question to him?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. McMAHON. Under the specie-resumption law—and I do not wish to argue, I only want to state it—under the specie-resumption law the Secretary of the Treasury was ordered to redeem fractional currency in silver coin.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. McMAHON. Now, in July, 1876, we authorized him to pay out $10,000,000 of silver coin and to take in $10,000,000 of greenbacks.

We authorized him to redeem this fractional currency outstanding in greenbacks, and he has never done it.

Mr. GARFIELD. How does my colleague know that?

Mr. McMAHON. I say it because the debt statement shows it; I have it here, and I read on page 4 of the Treasury report, currency assets, "United States notes, special fund for redemption of fractional currency, $10,000,000."

Mr. GARFIELD. Well.

Mr. McMAHON. Now it never was in contemplation of the gentlemen who passed that law in 1876 that when that $10,000,000 was taken in it should be kept. That was a little private scheme of contraction of Mr. Sherman himself. Our order to him was to pay out in redemption of fractional currency. Instead of that he is redeeming constantly in silver coin and keeping the $10,000,000 in.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will answer my colleague. I am not responsible for the Secretary's execution of his duty under that law. But I should say if I were the Secretary I was bound by the law and by the reason of the case to hold a sufficient amount of that fund to be an ample protection for all the outstanding scrip which would be likely to come in. Perhaps the Secretary has kept more than he needed to; and if he has, it is perfectly competent for this Congress to ascertain, after a fair examination, how much of that he can spare, and then let it out. I will agree to that at any time. But my colleague took no such method as that; he says simply let it all go, and he proposes to make this sweeping change of law and give up the whole reserve for that purpose, and therefore to that extent, or at least to some extent, breaks over the line of our reserve.

Now I have said all I desire to say on that subject except a single word in conclusion. My colleague pained me by a single expression in his speech. There has never anything occurred between him and me which entitled either of us to say discourteous and indecent things about the other; and when my colleague said that I owed more allegiance to the soldier than perhaps to any other class, and when he said further that I appeared to act as though I owed my chief allegiance to Wall street, he said what he had no more right to say on this floor, either as a matter of fact or a matter of fair inference, than I would have a right to say he owes his chief allegiance to the groggeries and whisky-shops of Dayton; and as I would not say that I do not think he was entitled to say the other.

Mr. McMAHON. In answer to the gentleman I say this: I have followed with interest the public career of the gentleman, and if in all the discussions which have ever taken place in this House or this country on financial questions he can show one vote or one speech that was not based upon the idea of speedy resumption, no matter at what cost to the great mass of the people, even when his own party separated from him upon that question in the Forty-third Congress, when he was in a minority in his own party upon this question—if he can show one vote which he ever cast in favor of what was regarded then by the majority of his own party in the West as the interest of the people on this question, I will take my statement back. That is all that it covered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will relieve my colleague upon that point. He could not certainly praise me any more according to my notions of legislative praise than to say what he has said. If I ever did cast a vote that was not in favor of the resumption of specie payments, that was not against all schemes to delay it unreasonably and prevent it, then I cast a vote that my conscience and my judgment disapproved of. [Applause.] And I do not know but I have cast as many votes as any man on this floor against Wall street and the business of gold-gambling there which has been destroyed by resumption; that gold-gambling in Wall street which locked up one hundred millions of the business capital of this country for fifteen years, away from all profitable investment, and converted Wall street into a faro hell gambling with the business of this country up and down. And if every vote of mine in favor of honest money has not been a blow at gambling in Wall street, then it has not had the effect I intended.

Mr. BRIGHT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. Have not the operations of Wall street been simply transferred to the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. GARFIELD. In answer to the gentleman from Tennessee, I will say that I hope there has been enough of the gold and silver in this country that have hitherto been lodged in Wall street for gold-gambling purposes transferred to the Treasury of the United States to break down the bulls and bears of Wall street permanently and to maintain the supremacy of honest money. [Applause.]

Mr. McMAHON. Before the gentleman takes his seat I wish to ask him what wrong there can be in our ordering this amount of $10,000,000 to be reissued when the law under which it was taken into the Treasury ordered it to be paid out in redemption of fractional currency, which has not been done?

Mr. GARFIELD. If my colleague will have an inquiry made at the Treasury and find out how much of these ten millions can fairly be spared and a sufficient reserve still kept to meet all obligations of that reserve, I will join him in voting to apply the balance, the surplus, of it to those purposes, but not the whole.

Mr. McMAHON. I think we can come to an agreement under the gentleman's modification of his position. The last public debt statement shows fifteen millions of fractional currency outstanding. I hold in my hand the report of the Treasurer of the United States, in which he says:

Estimating the loss of fractional currency at $8,083,513.50, the figures reported by the commission appointed by you, there may still be issued, before the limit of $50,000,000 is reached, $8,127,684.69 in exchange for fractional currency and $2,144,149.31 for currency obligations.

Now we have got only thirty-nine millions of subsidiary silver coin, and according to this estimate of the Treasurer of the United States there was but eight millions of fractional currency that will come in for redemption. Why not put this out?

Mr. GARFIELD. Putting it all out is a breaking of the public faith. It ought to be out if it can be honestly paid out, but if the public faith requires it to be in, it ought to be in while the world stands.

Mr. McMAHON. Where did we ever give the creditor of the United States any hold on that? I ask for the law or contract.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have given him the pledge of the law.

Mr. McMAHON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The amount issued does not exceed the amount which we have pledged our faith to the public creditor shall not be exceeded.

Mr. GARFIELD. No committee of this House has taken up this question and reported upon it and said that this which is proposed is honest to the public creditor. It is the opinion of my colleague. It may be the opinion of a caucus. But before we carry this out I think it ought to be based on the opinion of a committee of this House.

Mr. McMAHON. Gentlemen will find by reference to the Treasurer's report that this is part of the $346,000,000. It is idle capital, which nobody has any interest in tying up except people who want to have the currency contracted. It is true the amendment is my individual opinion. It has not been submitted to any caucus or any committee. But it is so clearly right that the House cannot fail to see its propriety without the assistance of any committee's report. And the gentleman has failed to show where the public faith will be violated.

Mr. WEAVER. I hope the amendment will prevail. I can see no good reason for keeping locked up in the Treasury in the present condition of the country this amount of $10,000,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would suggest to the gentleman that he should allow the Chair to decide the point of order and then he can discuss the merits.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa want to speak to the point of order?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I think it unquestioned that the $346,000,000 of legal-tender notes outstanding include the $10,000,000 held in the Treasury for the redemption of the fractional currency, and it is a part of the current history of the finances of the country, and well understood by everybody, that the Secretary of the Treasury is abundantly able to redeem all the fractional currency as it comes in with fractional silver. There have been issued of the $50,000,000 fractional silver authorized but $39,000,000. This leaves a margin sufficient to cover all the outstanding fractional currency.

Now, I want to know why the greenbacks should be kept in the Treasury; and why this amendment is not in order? It certainly is a step in the direction of economy and of relief for the people.

I understood the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in answer to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS,] to say that the law passed during the Forty-fifth Congress requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out greenbacks as they came in under the resumption law, was simply a law to make that certain which was before uncertain. Not at all, Mr. Chairman. The resumption law was a bold attempt to convert every greenback into interest-bearing debt and then to destroy them.

Let me read the law passed May 31, 1878, to stop this destruction:

That from and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury or other officer under him, to cancel or retire any more of the United States legal-tender notes. And when any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury under any law from any source whatever, and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but they shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation.

That is the law. Under the resumption act the Secretary of the Treasury was destroying the greenbacks, every one that came into his hands. This law was passed by the Forty-fifth Congress to prevent the further destruction of greenbacks; and it further provides that he should pay them out and keep them in circulation. This amendment does not change existing law. Why keep on hoarding them? Why keep them there to redeem fractional currency when there is no necessity, when you have plenty of fractional silver currency to redeem them with? It is a mere trick of the Secretary to avoid the plain object of the law and to circumvent public sentiment.

Now, the policy of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is this: to issue bonds to get money to pay the arrearages of pensions, while ours is to issue the idle greenbacks now in the Treasury and save to the people this enormous and unnecessary increase of the public debt. Let the proposition be well understood by the House.

Mr. REED. I for one have been willing to listen a reasonable time to a discussion that has seemed to me entirely outside of the question before the House. As I understand it, that question is whether the amendment is admissible on the point of order. I do not think the merits of the amendment should be discussed until that question is decided. It does not seem to me that we can now go into the question on the merits.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say that after the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] who introduced the amendment had been allowed to proceed to discuss it at length on the merits, as well as on the point of order, the Chair felt that it was nothing but fair that his colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] should have the same opportunity; that, however, was by unanimous consent. The committee is acting under the five-minute rule.

Mr. ATKINS. I am not willing to object to the gentleman from Iowa, but after he is done I shall object.

Mr. REED. I desire to raise a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to raise a point of order.

Mr. CARLISLE. I think the gentleman from Iowa is strictly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is discussing the point of order; but the Chair desires to say that we are under the five-minute rule, and he is therefore liable to a point of order.

Mr. WEAVER. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. In the discussion of a point of order, are we under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair has ruled on that point, and knows of no rule that will allow the point of order to be discussed otherwise than under the five-minute rule.

Mr. WEAVER. But my time has not expired.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. WEAVER. I was about to say, when interrupted, that this amendment does not change existing law, and that it is in the line of a retrenchment of expenses; there cannot be any doubt about that, and hence it is strictly germane.

Now, there never was an accepted interpretation of the resumption law, that the greenbacks should be reissued again; but the plain intention of that act was that they should be destroyed as fast as they were received and bonds issued in their place; that is to say, they were to be funded and disappear altogether from circulation. The gentleman from Ohio is wide of the mark as to that, as I will show to the House from the most authentic and authoritative sources. That the original design of the resumption act was not intended to destroy the greenbacks is a mere afterthought and they were driven to it by an uprising of the people which they had not the courage to face.

I hold in my hand a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of 1875, in which he says:

The faith of the Government stands pledged to resumption, and on and after January 1, 1879, to the final redemption and removal from the currency of the country of the legal-tender notes as fast as they shall be presented for redemption, according to the provisions of the act of January 14, 1875.

That was the report of Secretary Bristow, the very Secretary under whose auspices the resumption act was prepared and passed through Congress.

The next Secretary, Mr. Morrill, says:

That the policy was tolerated in continuance of these notes as money after the close of the war, must be regarded as a public misfortune. At that time they were, according to original design, by the logic of their existence, to be funded as a pledge of their indebtedness and to be embodied in the public debt, and not to be treated or tolerated as an element of the national currency.

Now, what becomes of the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD?]

Here are two Secretaries of the Treasury, one under whose advice the resumption law was passed, and the succeeding Secretary, both of whom say that the policy of the law was to remove all the greenbacks from circulation. But the act of May 31, 1878, came in and provided that no more of them should be destroyed, and that they should be reissued by the Secretary of the Treasury. Instead of doing that, under a technical construction of the law, he now hoards in the Treasury, and will continue to do so, $10,000,000 of legal-tender notes, and proposes to saddle upon the people of this country $10,000,000 more of bonded debt and to tax the labor of the country for thirty years to come to pay the interest on that amount.

Now let the issue be sharply and strongly drawn here. We oppose such legislation and appeal to the country to sustain us. Let the gentleman, if he chooses, take the position of increasing the bonded debt of the country. He is welcome to his choice. We will abide the result of that issue both in this House and before the country.

Mr. REED. I desire to make a suggestion to the Chair in regard to the point of order which has been raised. I do not desire to discuss the question which has been mooted by the gentleman who last had the floor, [Mr. WEAVER.] If this amendment is not admissible under the rules of this House, then it seems to me entirely unnecessary to discuss it.

One thing is essential to the admission of the amendment; that is, that it shall be germane to the subject-matter being considered and to which it is moved. What is the subject-matter of this portion of the bill? It is to provide for the officials who are running the Pension Bureau. That is the full scope, the whole meaning, the entire purpose of this portion of the bill.

This bill is not a pension appropriation bill but an executive appropriation bill. And to endeavor to foist upon this bill a change of the law, or, whether it be a change of the law or not, a provision as to the fund out of which pensions shall be paid, is a degradation of the rules of the House.

Now I desire especially to call the attention of the Chair to this matter. It has become one of vital importance to the House and to the country as well. We are tacking on, under the plea of germaneness, everything that has in it the same adjective that may be in the bill before us. Here is a bill containing an appropriation for the Pension Office. Under the guise of germaneness to that appropriation we are asked to put on financial legislation which concerns the whole country, and least of all the pensioners. We have voted to pay the pensioners, and will do so somehow or other.

Now I submit to the Chair that this thing should be taken in hand and the rule established by decisions, so that the action of the House under the rule may be confined within some sort of reasonable and decent limits.

Mr. FORT. If this amendment is germane and tends to retrench expenditures, then under Rule 120 it is in order. I will not discuss the question as to whether it is germane or not; I will leave that for other gentlemen to do. But it appears to me clear that the adoption of this amendment will decrease expenditures, and therefore must be in order if it is germane.

While I do not indorse all that my friend from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] has said about party politics or about the action of the republican party—and I certainly do not indorse what he said about the present Secretary of the Treasury—yet he has truthfully stated that the Government has now in the Treasury $10,000,000 of legal-tender notes; also that the amount of the fractional currency outstanding, for which this ten millions was provided as a resumption fund, has now fallen to and perhaps below $15,000,000.

Now, can it possibly be necessary that we should continue to hold in the Treasury ten millions of legal-tender notes in order to redeem fifteen millions of fractional currency which may never be presented for redemption? Moreover, we have, as has been shown, a sufficient quantity of silver in the Treasury to redeem every single cent of the fractional currency that possibly can be presented, even if none at all of it had been destroyed. And it is estimated that at least ten millions of the fractional currency has been lost, and that there is not five millions of it now in existence, and yet we hold ten millions of legal-tenders to redeem this five millions. This $10,000,000 is now lying idle in the Treasury. The United States is in debt; it is paying interest on borrowed money. If we pay out this $10,000,000 it will be paid out either upon a debt upon which we are paying interest or upon another indebtedness. We are in debt many millions to the soldiers, and if we do not pay out this ten millions to them on pensions due them we must borrow ten millions more and pay interest on it. Hence if this amendment is adopted we will borrow ten millions less, and we will save certainly the interest on that $10,000,000, which, at 4 per cent., will be $400,000 annually, or more than $1,000 for every day of the year, Sundays, Mondays, and all.

Gentlemen say that this amount must be kept for a redemption fund of the fractional currency. This ten millions now hoarded in the Treasury is a part of the three hundred and forty-six millions of legal-tender notes; and the Secretary of the Treasury keeps also locked up in the Treasury about 50 per cent. of that amount in gold, and so under the policy of the Secretary we keep locked up this ten millions in legal tender and five millions more in gold to redeem it with. And thus we lock up fifteen millions of the people's money, which they need, and at the same time we are in debt and paying interest on this fifteen millions, which ought to be saved. It seems to me clear that the adoption of this amendment will reduce expenditures at least to the amount of more than $1,000 every day by saving interest on this $10,000,000.

There can be no question but what a sufficient quantity of silver is now in the Treasury—or, if not there, can soon be put there by our mints—to redeem every dollar of fractional currency that can be presented. But it is not coming in. My old friend from Pennsylvania now before me [Mr. WRIGHT] would not walk across the street to have ten cents or $10,000 of it redeemed. The people are not anxious to have it redeemed. It suits them very well, and they will make no run on the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed a moment more I would say that I would do nothing in the world to interfere with resumption. Resumption has come, and I am glad of it. I was not in favor of hastening to it by the way of contraction. I wanted to keep all our money in circulation; and I believe we could have reached resumption easier and as soon by keeping all our legal-tenders in circulation as to do the way we have done. I rejoice, however, that it has come; and having come, I am in favor of doing every reasonable thing to maintain it. I never want to travel this rugged road to resumption over again. But I do not believe that it is necessary to lock up $10,000,000 of legal-tenders in order to maintain resumption. Resumption is an assured thing, and he is a mischievous man who would disturb it. Now, sir, as this amendment is clearly in the interest of economy, I think it is in order under Rule 120, and hope the gentleman's point of order will be overruled by the Chair and the amendment adopted by the House.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, this expenditure for pensions must be met by paying out money now in the Treasury, or by the sale of additional bonds, or by increased taxation. It is conceded that the $10,000,000 now held in the Treasury for the redemption of fractional currency is a part of the $346,000,000 existing when the act of May 31, 1878, was passed prohibiting the cancellation of any part of the legal-tender currency then in existence. Now, if this $10,000,000 is a legitimate part of the present volume of currency, and is not actually required for other purposes, why should we either increase taxation, or increase the interest-bearing debt, or resort to other means to provide for the payment of pensions due to disabled soldiers? If this money is not a part of the volume of our currency, then other questions arise. But I think no one will dispute the fact that it is. No question of inflation, then, or increase in the volume of the currency is involved. It is a question simply of liberating and utilizing ten millions of money now uselessly locked up, and thereby avoiding the necessity of raising that amount by taxation or an increase of the bonded debt. It certainly is in the line of retrenchment to avoid interest or the necessity of increasing the revenue.

But my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] says that this $10,000,000 is held in the Treasury for the redemption of fractional currency, and that the public faith is pledged that it shall remain there. Now, it is perfectly well understood that a large part of the fractional currency which has not been presented for redemption is not in existence. It is well known that small pieces of paper money, such as five and ten cent notes, rapidly go to destruction, and it is not probable that one-half of the amount still unredeemed will ever be presented for redemption. To meet any demand of this kind, however, we have subsidiary silver coinage in ample supply. The resumption act itself provides for the use of this subsidiary coinage for the redemption of the fractional notes.

But it is said that the faith of the Government is pledged that this $10,000,000 shall be kept in the Treasury. Where, by what act is it pledged that this money shall remain permanently locked up in the Treasury. It is not required for the redemption of fractional currency; and, what is more to the point, it is not used for that purpose, and has not been. I find that in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for last month, this $10,000,000 is counted as part of the $346,000,000 of the active currency of the country. Nor was the locking up of these $10,000,000 part of the provisions for resumption. I submit to gentlemen on the other side whether it was not understood whether the Secretary of the Treasury did not consent that resumption should proceed upon the basis of $346,000,000 of legal-tender paper.

The act of May 31, 1878, plainly contemplates this and prohibits any reduction in the volume. By this amendment, then, no alteration whatever in the volume of the currency is proposed, and there is no infraction of the public faith. If permitted to do so, I would moreover assure gentlemen who are so very solicitous about "honest" money that this $10,000,000 is just as "honest" as any of the rest of the $346,000,000 and quite as "honest" as national-bank notes, and soldiers entitled to pensions will be but too glad to get it.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words on the point of order. I disapprove of any legislation on appropriation bills otherwise than express provisions for appropriations. But under the rules of the House, very bad rules I think, this proposition is pertinent; and I desire to illustrate its pertinency by referring to a recent case of bankruptcy which has evoked the sympathy of every good man throughout the country, without reference to his religious opinions.

This proposition to pay out $10,000,000 now in the Treasury instead of incurring an indebtedness for this amount at 4 per cent. per annum is not only a measure of economy for this particular year, but for long years to come—perhaps forever. The interest which we are paying, though it be but 4 per cent., pays when compounded the principal of the bonds in less than twenty years; yet at the end of that time we still owe the amount of the bonds. Thus we tax the people to pay in the form of interest what is equivalent to the face of the bond, while still posterity owes the indebtedness. I am averse to any increase of the bonded debt, and I stand upon the pledged faith of the Government, reiterated in act after act, that no such increase shall take place. If there be one act providing for resumption, every act that has provided for the refunding or for the increase of the bonded loan, down to the resumption act, pledged the faith of the country that there should be no further increase of the bonded indebtedness.

Sir, the case to which I have referred was the bankruptcy of the venerable archbishop of Ohio, than whom, so far as I know, no purer man lives. But he was not a wise financier. According to the latest statements I have seen, which appear to be authoritative, he borrowed for his church from $400,000 to $500,000; and his bankruptcy is said to be for over $4,000,000. Why? He had not provided for compound interest. He had built churches and colleges, which were pecuniarily unproductive, forgetting that interest was compounding; and his $400,000 of indebtedness became $4,000,000. Such is what is going on under our system of borrowing money to substitute base silver tokens, which cannot be sent through the mails, for a convenient fractional currency which was promoting a minor commerce throughout all parts of the country. And now for current uses we are to add $10,000,000 to the bonded debt to pay pensioners moneys which we have withheld from them for years. We are to increase our bonded debt and increase the volume of compounding interest. Inasmuch as this amendment prevents that, it is in the line of present and perpetual economy, and is therefore in order.

Mr. ATKINS. I trust we shall now have a ruling on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, the word "germane," as employed in the rule to which it is held this amendment is obnoxious, does not, when properly construed, require more than that the proposed amendment shall be akin to the subject-matter of the bill. This bill certainly makes an appropriation for defraying the expenses of the machinery of the Government. As to this being in the direction of retrenchment of expenditures, the Chair does not understand that is in controversy. He therefore holds the point of order is not well taken and that the amendment is in order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, adding to it the following:

And fractional currency presented for redemption shall be redeemed in any moneys in the Treasury at the time it is presented.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that this $10,000,000——

Mr. MCMAHON. I do not object to that amendment; I will accept it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I wish to say a word about the amendment. I understand this $10,000,000 is in the Treasury for the redemption of the fractional currency, as has been already explained. It is a part, as I understand the statement of both gentlemen from Ohio, of the $346,000,000 of legal-tender notes for circulation. Unquestionably a part of this fractional currency is outstanding. I have no doubt a part of it is lost or destroyed, and never will be presented. For one, I can see no objection to paying out these Treasury notes, held for the redemption of this fractional currency, being as it is a part of the $346,000,000, provided you give means for the redemption of fractional currency as it is presented.

Now, under the original law, Revised Statutes, section 3574, fractional currency, in series of not less than $3, was exchangeable for United States notes. Now, with the adoption of this amendment, I can see no objection to the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCMAHON,] and I shall vote for it, and I submit to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that it will release the $10,000,000 for the purpose indicated, while my amendment provides for the redemption of the outstanding fractional currency as it may be presented, which, I presume, will be in small quantities and not rapidly.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment to the amendment will not be adopted. The resumption scheme (including the joint resolution of July 22, 1876) contemplates as part of the permanent circulation the sum of $50,000,000 of fractional currency, whether paper or coin. Thirty-nine million dollars of fractional coin have been issued. There are from fourteen to fifteen millions of fractional paper not yet presented for redemption. Of that the best estimates indicate that about $10,000,000 have been lost or destroyed. Now, the $10,000,000 of greenbacks held temporarily for the redemption of fractional currency may be reissued, and yet all the fractional paper which may hereafter be presented can be redeemed in a further issue of fractional coin without transgressing the limit of $50,000,000 as the permanent aggregate volume of fractional paper and coin.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. EWING. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I hold in my hand the original act under which the fractional currency was issued, and it expressly declares that fractional currency shall be interchangeable for legal-tender notes for sums of $3 and upward and receivable in payment for revenue and postage stamps and all dues to the Government in sums of $5 and under. Would the gentleman go back on the contract as to fractional currency, it now being held in small quantities?

Mr. EWING. I desire fractional currency now outstanding shall be redeemed in fractional silver as contemplated in the resumption law. If there was any going back on the original contract as to redemption of fractional currency, it was in the passage of that law.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The resumption law does not say a word about it. That is in reference to legal-tender notes; it does not touch fractional notes.

Mr. EWING. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it does, and provides for the redemption of fractional paper currency solely in an equal issue of fractional silver coin.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have examined the resumption act with some care and I do not find it.

Mr. EWING. The gentleman will find it in the first section of the resumption law of January 14, 1875. My objection is that if this amendment be adopted requiring the Secrerary of the Treasury to redeem the fractional paper now outstanding with "any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," it will be held to be a repeal by implication of the provision of the resumption law which requires the fractional paper to be redeemed with an equal issue of new fractional coin. It will thus operate a contraction of the currency to the extent of the fractional paper redeemed. I think it bad policy to do that. I think it important not only to issue the ten millions of greenbacks now lying idle in the Treasury, but also to put or keep in circulation the whole of the fifty millions of fractional currency limited by existing law. I therefore hope that the House will not sanction a contraction of the currency by authorizing the redemption and cancellation of fractional paper with money already in circulation, but will hold the Secretary to the first section of the resumption law which requires him to coin and issue new fractional silver as fast as he redeems and cancels old fractional paper. Even then the volume of fractional currency cannot much exceed $40,000,000, because so much of the paper is lost; and I am sure no one will say that that sum of fractional currency is too large for its infinitely numerous uses in the small transactions of the people.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, to the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 79.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and Mr. EWING were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 86.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EWING. I should like to reserve the right to have a vote on this in the House.

Mr. MCMAHON'S amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States Patent Office:

For compensation of the Commissioner of the Patent Office, $4,500; for Assistant Commissioner, (who shall act as Commissioner in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of the Commissioner, and shall perform such other duties as may be assigned to him by the Commissioner,) $3,000; for chief clerk, $2,250; three examiners-in-chief, at $3,000 each; examiner in charge of interferences, trade-mark examiner, and twenty-two principal examiners, at $2,250 each; twenty-two first assistant examiners, at $1,800 each; twenty-two second assistant examiners, at $1,600 each; twenty-two third assistant examiners, at $1,400 each; one financial clerk, $2,000, who shall give bond in such amount as the Secretary of the Interior may determine; one librarian, $2,000; one machinist, $1,600; four clerks of class 4; five clerks of class 3, (one of whom shall be translator of languages;) nineteen clerks of class 2; and thirty clerks of class 1; thirty-two clerks, at $1,000 each; for sixty copyist clerks, at $900 each; for three skilled draughtsmen, at $1,200 each; for one messenger and purchasing clerk, $1,000; for one skilled laborer, $1,200; for ten attendants in model-room, at $800 each; ten assistant messengers; thirty laborers; six laborers, at $600 each; five folders and pasters, at $480 each; in all, $394,550.

Mr. ATKINS. I move, in line 1661, to strike out "eight" and insert "nine;" so it will read: "for ten attendants in model-room, at $900 each;" and in line 1664 to strike out "four" and insert "five;" so it will read: "$395,550." This only increases the pay $100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following paragraph:

For photolithographing or otherwise producing copies of the weekly issues of drawings to be attached to patents and copies, $35,000; the work of said photolithographing, or otherwise producing plates and copies, referred to in this and the two preceding paragraphs, to be done under the supervision of the Commissioner of Patents, and in the city of Washington, if it can there be done at reasonable rates; and the Commissioner of Patents, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized to make contracts therefor.

Mr. MORSE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 1703 to 1705 strike out the following words: "and in the city of Washington if it can there be done at reasonable rates," and insert the following words: "wherever it can be done at reasonable rates to the satisfaction of the Commissioner.

Mr. ATKINS. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts seems fair. And I so insisted myself in the Committee on Appropriations in the discussion of this subject. But after very mature consideration of the matter, and after it had been discussed at length and we had got the opinion of the Commissioner upon it, the committee came to the conclusion to leave the language as it is. There is certain lithographing to be done, current-lithographing, as it is called, which it is difficult to have performed anywhere else except in Washington. I admit that it does not look well to confine any kind of work that is to be paid for by the Government to any particular man or class of men or to any particular city. I admit all that; yet under all the circumstances the committee felt it was best to leave the lauguage as it is in the bill in compliance with the very earnest request of the Commissioner of Patents on this subject. It is in the form in which the clause has been inserted for several years. And now, after having made that statement, I will say that it is perfectly immaterial to me whether that language goes in or goes out.

Mr. MORSE. It is not immaterial to me whether it goes out. The gentleman from Tennessee himself admits that my amendment seems fair; and I say it is unfair to leave the matter as it is. And as my amendment leaves it entirely in the hands of the Commissioner to do as he pleases there can be, as it seems to me, no good objection to it.

Mr. FIELD. I hope the amendment of my colleague will prevail. The city of Washington is not large enough to have work of this kind done by contract, and it must fall into the hands of one man. The amendment provides that the work must be done to the satisfaction of the Commissioner; and if any part must be done here that part will be done here; the rest is left to be contracted for wherever it can be done cheapest and best.

Mr. CONGER. It is possible that the language as it is in the law and as it has been for some years makes a job somewhere. But as a bee-hunter when he lines a bee from this angle and a bee from that angle finds where they meet, it has occurred to me as possible that these recommendations coming from two gentlemen on opposite sides of the House whose lines of vision must be directed toward Boston look like a job in Boston. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORSE. They do. [Continued laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. I looked at these little indications in that way and I found them center on the Hub as the place where the job was intended to go. We have tried Boston, and the best firm in Boston had this contract some years ago and it failed to perform the work to the satisfaction of the Government or of anybody that understood it, either at the Patent Office or anywhere else, and the contract was taken away from Boston and was given to one who could perform it under the immediate supervision of the Commissioner of Patents.

Now I think the remarks of the gentleman who has charge of this bill explain the whole subject. This is a kind of work requiring such special accuracy of detail and finish that it must be done under the eye of the Commissioner or the examiner from day to day, and it must be done at the expense of the Government by such examination from day to day whether it pays the expenses of officers of the department to Boston, or to New York, or to New Orleans, or wherever the job may be laid. I had occasion to inquire into this matter and I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] that in the opinion of the Commissioner and all others interested in this work it is almost an essential thing that it should be done where it can be done under the constant supervision of the office.

I would be very glad that this work might be done in Boston. I should be sorry that it should be taken away from Philadelphia. I wish we had in the little city where I live somebody competent to take this job and do it. We all like to get things for our own cities; and here are my friends differing as widely as heaven and earth on almost every question that comes before this House, one on this side and one on that, and they lock hands on giving this little job of lithographing to the hub of the universe. I do not hear the cities of Philadelphia, of New York, Baltimore, New Orleans, all the other cities where there are lithographers—I do not hear them claiming that we shall vote so that this contract, or this job, as it is called, may go to them. I think, Mr. Chairman, if the present occupant of the chair [Mr. CLYMER] were in his place on the floor we might hear something in favor of Philadelphia, for this job, or some other city in the Keystone State. The gentleman who represents Philadelphia interests continually is here in his seat near me, [Mr. O'NEILL,] but I have not yet heard from him on this subject.

Mr. O'NEILL. I was listening to what the gentleman was saying about Philadelphia.

Mr. CONGER. I have thought that somebody interested in Philadelphia would have rushed forward to the defense of Philadelphia interests, as my friend here [Mr. O'NEILL] is in the habit of doing with an energy hardly ever equalled. Yet nobody seems to oppose this amendment in favor of Boston except the Representative of a city in the West which has as yet got no lithographers. But seriously, the Committee on Appropriations of this House from year to year for the last five years have thought it best to put this matter under the control and supervision of the Patent Office.

Mr. MORSE. Nobody proposes to take it from under the supervision of the Commissioner of Patents. No one wants the work to go to Boston or anywhere else or to any other city.

Mr. CONGER. Unless it is intended to give this work some particular direction, why offer the amendment? I take it that my friend never offers an amendment here unless he has some design in it. If he authorizes me to say to his constituents in Boston that he did not intend to give this work a direction toward Boston, I will do it.

Mr. MORSE. That is exactly what I have said.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman will not permit me to say that, I know. He will not allow me to say that he did not intend to send this work to Boston.

Mr. MORSE. I want every city in the Union to have an equal chance.

Mr. CONGER. I simply call upon the representatives of other cities to put in their claims.

Mr. FIELD. The gentleman from Michigan is anxious for the city of Boston. I am not anxious at all. I do not care whether Boston gets this work or not. It is not of the least consequence to Boston or to me, but there is nothing in the amendment to take the work to Boston. The objection to the existing law is that it compels the Commissioner to have the work done in the city of Washington. Washington is too small a city to afford competition. The object of the amendment is to have such part of the work as can be done elsewhere contracted for anywhere, and if the city of Port Huron can do it the cheapest and best for the whole country, I hope it shall be allowed to do it. I have no jealousy against Port Huron, but the city of Boston does not get its living out of the Government of the United States.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I think the amendment offered by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] is correct. When you come to look at the words in this bill its purpose and intention is to confine the work to the city of Washington, and in doing so exclude competition by the genius and talent of every other city or place. It is special and class legislation, and it looks to me very much as if it had a job in it. The proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts is to leave it to the capital and energy of the entire Union. It is right in spirit and I trust it will be adopted.

The question was taken on Mr. MORSE'S amendment, and it was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read as follows:

Office of Auditor of Railroad Accounts:

For Auditor, $3,600; book-keeper, $2,400; assistant book-keeper, $2,000; one clerk, $1,400; one copyist, $900; traveling and other expenses, $1,000; incidental expenses, $250; in all $11,550.

Mr. ATKINS. In line 1735, after the word "dollars," I move to insert "for railroad engineer, $2,000," and in line 1737, after the word "thousand," to insert "$400," and in lines 1738 and 1739 strike out "$11,550" and insert "$14,050."

It is proper I should state that there is no law authorizing an appropriation for an engineer, but, sir, I am informed by the Commissioner that it is absolutely necessary for him to have an engineer in order to make out his accounts and in order to report the condition of the different railroads with the supervision of which he is charged. Therefore I have concluded that I would submit the amendment and let the House vote upon it and decide the question for itself. I think it is right to allow an engineer to this Railroad Auditor.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read as follows:

For First Assistant Postmaster-General, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,000; two clerks of class 4; twelve clerks of class 3; six clerks of class 2; twelve clerks of class 1; two clerks, at $1,000 each; three assistant messengers; superintendent of blank agency, $1,800; assistant superintendent of blank agency, $1,600; four assistants to superintendent of blank agency, at $1,200 each; two assistants to superintendent of blank agency, at $900 each; one assistant messenger; one laborer, (for blank agency;) superintendent of free delivery, $2,100; one clerk of class 2, office of superintendent of free delivery;) in all, $70,140.

Mr. THOMAS. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1762, on page 72, after the words "Postmaster-General," strike out the words "three thousand five hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the words "four thousand."

Mr. ATKINS. I raise the point of order on that amendment that there is no law authorizing an increase of this salary.

Mr. THOMAS. I call the attention of the House to the fact that the law as it now exists fixes the salary of the three Assistant Postmasters-General at $4,000. Section 389, chapter 65, of the Revised Statutes, says:

There shall be in the Post-Office Department three Assistant Postmasters-General, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who may be removed in the same manner, and who shall be entitled to a salary of $4,000 a year each.

I submit that since the salaries of the Assistant Postmasters-General are fixed by law at $4,000, a proper appropriation should be made to pay that salary.

If the law is wrong, if the salary is too high, then the law should be repealed or amended. But why complicate matters by leaving an unsatisfied claim on the part of these officers against the Government, to be disposed of hereafter before the Court of Claims?

Mr. ATKINS. Is the gentleman discussing the point of order?

Mr. THOMAS. I submit that I am discussing the point of order; I am speaking directly to the point of order. This amendment is not in violation of existing law.

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to state that the act passed January 20, 1874, repealed the act to which he has referred.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the gentleman have read the act which he says repealed the section of the Revised Statutes to which I have called attention?

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874," as provides for the increase of the compensation of public officers and employés, whether members of Congress, Delegates, or others, except the President of the United States and the Justices of the Supreme Court, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the salaries, compensation, and allowances of all said persons, except as aforesaid, shall be as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of said act: Provided, That mileage shall not be allowed for the first session of the Forty-third Congress; that all moneys appropriated as compensation to the members of the Forty-second Congress, in excess of the mileage and allowances fixed by law at the commencement of said Congress, and which shall not have been drawn by the members of said Congress respectively, or which, having been drawn, have been returned in any form to the United States, are hereby covered into the Treasury of the United States and are declared to be the moneys of the United States absolutely, the same as if they had never been appropriated as aforesaid.

Mr. BAKER. That law has no reference whatever to the section of the Revised Statutes which has been referred to. The provision found in the Revised Statutes, and which was passed in the year 1872, fixes the compensation of Assistant Postmasters-General at $4,000 a year. Upon the revision of the statutes it is in that shape in the Revised Statutes. The law referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] neither increased nor diminished the salaries of these officers as they had been fixed by previous law. Consequently the repeal that is referred to there has no effect whatever on the question as to what legal compensation these officers are entitled to receive. The law stands in the Revised Statutes unrepealed and unaffected by any law which has been since passed. I have taken some trouble to look this matter up, feeling that injustice has been done the First Assistant Postmaster-General by placing his compensation in the annual appropriation bill at a sum considerably less than that received by many officers of a like grade in the various departments of the Government.

For instance, the Commissioner of Patents, the Commissioner of Pensions, the Auditor of Railroad Accounts, many of the Auditors in the Treasury Department, without having as onerous service to perform, service as laborious as this officer, receive a much higher compensation. I submit that there is no law changing the law as it was enacted more than seven years ago, fixing the compensation of this officer.

Mr. ATKINS. Section 3 of the act generally known as the "salary-grab law" was passed March 3, 1873, and provided for an increase of the salary of these Assistant Postmasters-General to $4,000 a year. The act of June 20, 1874, which was the repealing act, uses this language:

That so much of the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874," as provides for the increase of the compensation of public officers and employés, whether members of Congress, Delegates, or others, except the President of the United States and the Justices of the Supreme Court, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the salaries, compensation, and allowances of all said persons, except as aforesaid, shall be as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of said act.

The words "or others" embraces these and all other officers. It was distinctly understood that, with the exception made in that repealing law, all the salaries were put back which had been advanced by the salary-grab law.

Mr. BAKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER. Then I would ask, if the repeal of the "salary-grab" act resulted in the repeal of the law fixing the salary of the Assistant Postmasters-General at $4,000 a year, how does it happen that in the second revision of the statutes, which was made under the authority of Congress since the repeal of that so-called "salary-grab" act, we find this same provision of law remaining, fixing the salary of the Assistant Postmasters-General at $4,000 a year?

Mr. ATKINS. My friend on my left [Mr. BRAGG] will answer that question.

Mr. BRAGG. On page 1093 of the Revised Statutes of 1878 the gentleman will find, under the head of "Salaries," the act repealing salaries of members of Congress and others, passed in 1874. There is this note:

The following schedules have been furnished by the First Comptroller of the Treasury, and are introduced here to show the reduction of salaries made by the above act.

In that schedule I find the following:

Postmaster-General, $8,000; Assistant Secretaries of State, $3,500; Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, $4,500; Assistant Secretaries of the Interior, $3,500.

Mr. BLOUNT. Have not the law officers of the several Departments held that these salaries were reduced by the appropriation act of 1876?

Mr. ATKINS. That is true. But at any rate this repealing act of January 20, 1874, includes this class of officers beyond all question; and since that time there has never been an estimate beyond $3,500 for the salary of the First Assistant Postmaster-General or either of these other officers.

Mr. BAKER. In running through the schedule in the second revision of the statutes of the United States, as found on page 1093, I do not find anything which shows that the Assistant Postmasters-General are affected by the act repealing the increase of salaries of members of Congress and other officers.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not rest my argument upon that schedule at all.

Mr. BAKER. There is here a list of officers who are understood to be affected by the repeal; and in that list the gentleman will fail to find the Assistant Postmasters-General. Consequently I take it that the act of 1874 was not intended to change the law in reference to the amount of compensation that these officers should receive.

Mr. ATKINS. Allow me to ask the gentleman a question. Why has not the First Assistant Postmaster-General or his best friend on this floor (whom I take to be the gentleman from Indiana) insisted on an appropriation of $4,000 salary every year until now? I never heard of any such demand until last session.

Mr. BAKER. In answer to the accusation of being a friend of the First Assistant Postmaster-General—whatever that accusation may be worth—I have this to say——

Mr. ATKINS. I did not mean anything by that.

Mr. BAKER. I understood that. I was about to say that I suppose the First Assistant Postmaster-General has failed to make complaint in respect to this discrimination against him for the same reason that the ten attendants in the model-room who have received under the previous law the munificent sum of $900 a year, and who were reported at that rate in the bill prepared by the Committee on Appropriations and brought in at the last session, do not complain in regard to being now cut down to $800 a year. I suppose that these officers have not complained because they supposed they would be complaining to deaf ears.

All I desired was to bring to the attention of the House this gross injustice to an officer who is charged with high, responsible, onerous duties, much more laborious and responsible than are imposed on other officers who receive from $500 to $1,500 more per annum, and are subordinate to him in rank. I have brought this matter to the attention of the House not because I expected it would be acted upon favorably, but because I desire the country to take notice of the fact that this method of retrenchment which has been introduced here is "without rhyme or reason;" that it has no foundation unless it may be upon the principle of shutting your eyes and running a muck on some sort of arbitrary dead level; and if it proceeds on that theory I submit that there is no reason why the Auditor of Railroad Accounts, the Commissioner of Patents, and the Commissioner of Pensions should receive more than the First Assistant Postmaster-General, who has imposed upon him the great and responsible duty of supervising under the Postmaster-General the whole postal service of the Union.

Coming back, however, to the point of order, I submit that it will hardly do to say that those who were charged by act of Congress with the revision of our laws did not understand as well as my learned friend the scope and effect of this repealing law. It may be that the reviser was not a very wise man; that is possible; but I submit that having been charged with the duty of making this revision, of determining among other things what officers were affected by this repealing act, having had time allowed him to study the question more thoroughly than we can do here in this five-minute debate, it is quite prudent to assume that in this schedule and classification he has given the correct interpretation of the law.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, this matter is perfectly plain. The act of March 3, 1873, increased the salaries of various officers of the Government, beginning with the President, and including members of Congress, heads of Departments, and various other officers. The act of January 20, 1874, repealed that law in respect to all officers except the President of the United States and the justices of the Supreme Court, and the reason why the repeal did not apply to them was because under the Constitution their salaries cannot be reduced during their term of office.

Mr. BAKER. Is not the Comptroller of the Treasury charged under the law with the duty of determining the officers whose salaries are affected by this law, and has he not determined in a decision reported in the volume I hold in my hand that the act does not affect this officer?

Mr. ATKINS. Well, Mr. Chairman, I regret to know the fact that the Comptroller of the Treasury has left these officers out of that schedule. He left them out either by design or by accident. If he left them out by accident, then we should pay no attention to his action. If he left them out by design, he did so in the very teeth of the law itself. Here it is. It says that no officer shall be excepted from this repealing law except the President of the United States and the judges of the Supreme Court. It is for the gentleman to answer why the Comptroller of the Treasury did so. It certainly has no binding force on my conscience.

Mr. BLOUNT. In addition to the reason given by the gentleman from Tennessee who has just taken his seat, let me state that since that time the salaries of all the officers in the bill have been changed and a rule adopted by the law officers of the Government as to what was the law in reference to these salaries. That ruling applies to the officer in question and to all the other officers. I have heard no complaint that it was not the law, and we have gone on for years legislating on that theory. It has been so accepted by the country, and the question has been raised nowhere else except in this off-hand way on a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair.) It is not the province of the Chair to decide the merits of the question. The point of order has been raised that this salary is fixed at $3,500, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is not in order because it does not tend to reduce expenditures. The Chair is of the opinion that the act of 1874, repealing the act of March 3, 1873, swept away this increase of salary of the Assistant Postmaster-General, and therefore he holds the point of order is well taken, and rules the amendment out.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Second Assistant Postmaster-General, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,000; chief of division of inspection and equipment, $2,000; seven clerks of class 4, one of whom shall have $200 additional as superintendent of railway adjustment; twenty-seven clerks of class 3; thirteen clerks of class 2; twelve clerks of class 1; four clerks, at $1,000 each; two assistant messengers; in all, $101,540.

Mr. SLEMONS. In line 1781 I move to insert "and $250;" so it will read, "Chief of division of inspection and equipment, $2,250."

This is for the chief of division of inspection and equipment, and I hope the chairman of the committee will accept it.

Mr. ATKINS. I should like to accommodate the gentleman, but I cannot do so. I will, however, at his request reserve the point of order.

Mr. SLEMONS. This officer, Mr. Chairman, has eighteen subordinates. He now only gets $2,000 a year, while the chief of division of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, for the same service, gets $2,250. My amendment is to put this chief of division of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General upon the same footing with the chief of division in the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, and therefore I have moved to add $250 to his salary.

Mr. ATKINS. I dislike to object to anything the gentleman seems to be in earnest about. Here the chief clerk only gets $2,000.

Mr. SLEMONS. That is the man I am speaking of. That is the man I am trying to put upon the same footing with the chief of division in the next paragraph.

Mr. ATKINS. As I understand it, the gentleman is not speaking of the chief clerk, but the chief of division.

Mr. SLEMONS. Yes; the chief of division of inspection and equipment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Arkansas will yield, I should like to make a statement on this subject.

Mr. SLEMONS. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I know, Mr. Chairman, the duties of this chief of division of inspection and equipment under the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. The other chiefs of division get $2,250. This chief of division of inspection and equipment has important duties to perform. The payments for star service and railway service are made upon his certificates. All fines, forfeitures, and remissions are made on his certificates. Eighteen of the clerks in this bureau are under his supervision—three-fourths of the whole number; and I have no hesitation in saying the duties of his office are more important than any other.

Mr. ATKINS. More important than the chief clerk of that bureau?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes, sir, decidedly more important, requiring legal ability, honesty, and constant work. I have had occasion from time to time to examine with reference to this subject, and I therefore speak advisedly about it. It is true that the amendment is subject to the point of order, but the object of the remarks I am making is if possible to have the gentleman from Tennessee refrain from insisting on that point of order.

Mr. SLEMONS. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon it.

Mr. ATKINS. I regret my attention was not called to the subject sooner, so I might have investigated the particular duties of this officer more than I have. After having said what I deemed necessary I will not make the point of order, but leave the question to the House to vote upon it.

Mr. SLEMONS. Here is a full statement of this officer's duties and he is certainly entitled to the increase I propose.

Mr. SLEMONS's amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Third Assistant Postmaster-General, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,000; chief of division of dead letters, $2,250; chief of division of postage-stamps, $2,250; five clerks of class 4; fourteen clerks of class 3; twenty-two clerks of class 2; thirty-three clerks of class 1; six clerks, at $1,000 each; fifty-six female clerks, at $900 each; three assistant messengers; for seven laborers; four female laborers, at $480 each; in all, $176,900.

Mr. MONEY. I move, on page 73, line 1793, to strike out the word "five" and insert "six;" in the same line strike out "fourteen" and insert "sixteen;" in line 1794, after the word "twenty," strike out "two" and insert "five;" and in same line strike out, after the word "thirty," the word "three," and insert "four;" and in line 1796 strike out the word "six," after the word "fifty," and insert "seven;" on page 74, line 1799, strike out the word "seventy-six" and insert "eighty-nine;" after the word "thousand," in the same line, strike out the word "nine" and insert "five;" and at the end of the paragraph add "$2,000 of which shall be immediately available for temporary clerks;" so it will read:

For Third Assistant Postmaster-General, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,000; chief of division of dead letters, $2,250; chief of division of postage-stamps, $2,250; six clerks of class 4; sixteen clerks of class 3; twenty-five clerks of class 2; thirty-four clerks of class 1; six clerks, at $1,000 each; fifty-seven female clerks, at $900 each; three assistant messengers; for seven laborers; four female laborers, at $480 each; in all, $189,500; $2,000 of which shall be immediately available for temporary clerks.

Mr. MONEY. I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill to accept the amendment. I think I can show very clearly to the House the necessity for this increase of force.

Mr. ATKINS. I am aware that during the last session of Congress there were several laws passed which probably will require an increase of force in the Post-Office Department. I have looked into the subject somewhat and I am satisfied that an increase of force is needed for three or four reasons. They need an increase of force with reference to the registration of mail matter; and since we passed a law requiring subcontractors to draw their pay immediately from the Government, not allowing them to collect it from postmasters, an increase of force is needed on that account. There are two or three other laws which were passed, I am aware, which I feel satisfied will require an additional force. But, sir, this proposition has not been submitted to any committee and I for one do not feel willing to take the responsibility of accepting it; nor do I feel willing to make any serious opposition to it until I hear it discussed upon the floor. If there is really a great necessity for this increase of force it will be for the House to determine accordingly. The amendment is not liable to a point of order.

Mr. MONEY. I think I can show to the House in a very few minutes the necessity for this increase of force. It is the result of new legislation subsequent to the estimate of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General laid before the Committee on Appropriations. One portion of this new legislation is the act requiring the international postal cards in fulfillment of the agreement at the Paris convention, last year, of the several powers represented in the postal union. An increase of force is rendered necessary in consequence of these international postal cards, which must be distributed over the country as they are demanded, just as other postal cards are. Another part of this new legislation is the law passed last year to protect the rights of subcontractors, who are frequently swindled by contractors out of their pay. This makes a number of new deposit offices, the accounts of which are kept in the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General. Up to the time of the passage of that law there were in the United States thirty-two hundred of these deposit offices. In consequence of that law that number has been increased to ten thousand, the number being more than trebled. I will explain the reason of this increase. Every contractor is the agent of the Post-Office Department to collect quarterly the sums due from the different postmasters on the routes he supplies; but the subcontractor is not the agent. The contractor is a bonded officer of the Department, and the subcontractor is not. This law protects the rights of the subcontractor but does not in any degree constitute him an agent of the Post-Office Department.

Now, for instance, one contractor may have contracts on a thousand routes and may subcontract every one of them. One firm in this city has six hundred and twenty-seven and has subcontracted six hundred and ten of them. Under the old law there was only one account kept with a contractor and one warrant issued at each quarterly payment. Under the new law accounts must be kept with each one of these subcontractors and a warrant issued to each one of them quarterly. As soon as the subcontractor files his contract, as the law permits him to do, the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General is compelled to open an account with every one of these subcontractors. You will see how this largely increases the work of the office. The collection of these sums is part of the business of the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury, but the accounts of the deposit offices are kept by the Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Then, again, in the Post-Office bill passed at the close of the last session it was provided there should be a special stamp for letters that had not been fully paid. Heretofore the postmasters simply collected the overdue postage; now he is by law obliged to use a special stamp which cannot be used for any other purpose. He is charged with this, and must account for the money; and that increases the work in this office.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman to explain as to the registration of third-class mail matter.

Mr. MONEY. I was coming to that. By regulation of the Post-Office Department the Postmaster-General has extended the system of registration to third-class mail matter, which includes all kinds of merchandise, with some exceptions, such as glass, liquids, and other articles which would destroy or injure the contents of the mail-bags. That has gone into extended operation, to the great enhancement of the revenues of the Department, and of course additional clerical force is demanded for that service.

Then there is another thing. One out of every two hundred and eighty-four letters in the mail goes to the Dead-Letter Office, being about the smallest average of any country in the world except Germany. These letters have to be handled and special stamps have to be affixed, and this entails more work on the Department of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, who must not only handle the stamps, but return proper credits for them.

Then, again, an additional clerical force is rendered necessary by the increase of postal business, which is immense. It increases not only with the increased number of offices but with the increased miles of mail-routes. Last year we added between six hundred and seven hundred new mail-routes, which involved at least an equal number of new offices. And the business of the old offices increases as more people take newspapers and as there is more social and business correspondence.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, obtained the floor, and said: I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi that he may complete his statement.

Mr. MONEY. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy. I have very little more to say to the House.

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman is through upon that point, I would like him to explain as to the stub-books of the Department.

Mr. MONEY. In the law of 1874 the postage on periodicals sent by the mails is changed. Instead of its being paid by each subscriber the law provided that periodical literature of a certain class, coming within certain conditions, should be admitted at a postage rate of two cents a pound.

It is provided by law that the mails shall be weighed, and publishers pay the amount of postage each day or each week to the postmaster and take his receipt therefor, and then the postmaster is required to affix a stamp of the value of the postage paid to a stub-book made for the purpose and to cancel the stamp affixed as stamps on letters are canceled. Now, it has been discovered by the special agents of the Department that this law has been disregarded in a great degree. There are in the United States four thousand post-offices where newspapers are mailed, and in a great many cases the postmasters have received money for postage, but they have failed to affix the stamps, and very frequently when they have affixed the stamps they have failed to cancel them, and the consequence is that the Government has been defrauded of this revenue. This is especially onerous, because this class of mail matter amounts to nine-tenths of the mail matter carried annually, and it yields us only about one-thirtieth of the postal revenue.

Now the Postmaster-General has called in the stub-books from which these receipts are issued to be examined. There are four thousand of them which it will be necessary to examine; and immediately upon the beginning of the examination of these books it was discovered that very few had been kept correctly. Not only was it discovered that in many cases the stamps were not canceled, but also that none were sometimes affixed, although the Postmaster had received the money for them. The work of examination has shown in some cases that not only was the postmaster behind in his account but also in his General Post-Office account and in his money-order account.

In consequence of this examination there has been a great saving to the Government. Why, one book shows a loss to the Government of over $400. Immediately upon the call for these stub-books the postmasters began to write most urgently for these special stamps.

This new legislation requires additional force, but it also brings a large revenue to the Government; and although this amendment will involve an additional expense for nine clerks, yet the truth is there will be a saving of hundreds of thousands of dollars annually. In the matter of the pay of the fourth class of postmasters the saving was over $600,000, and it certainly will be a million in the next year.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman state to the committee whether he has any official communication from the Department on this subject?

Mr. MONEY. I have here a letter from the Postmaster-General to Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, transmitting a letter from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General. I have changed in the amendment the estimate submitted in one particular, naming the grade of one of the nine clerks asked for in the amendment, and I did that because it was suggested in a note from the Postmaster-General.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire, with the gentleman's permission, to make a single statement. I have looked into this matter of an increase of clerks and indorse what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] says. I have no doubt on an examination that an increase of clerks is required for the good of the service in the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the gentleman think an increase of nine clerks is required?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I think so for two reasons. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] has already spoken of the purpose for which they are required, and they are required for the especial reason that in this bureau, if you will go back and examine the reports, you will find that it has been conducted in a most economical and business-like manner.

It is not for me to say that it requires just eight, nine, or ten clerks; but taking the facts together, the change of the law, the work to be done, and the previous history of the transactions of this bureau, especially since the present chief has been at its head, I am satisfied that the increase should be granted.

Mr. MANNING. In regard to the increase of the clerical force, a statement is made in reference to an increase of work on account of the act passed in 1878—the law in reference to the subletting and transfer of mail contracts.

Mr. MONEY. I said that in consequence of this law that was passed it required an increase of deposit offices, and the number was increased to ten thousand.

Mr. MANNING. More than three times as many.

Mr. MONEY. I did not say that.

Mr. MANNING. Can you tell me now if that is so?

Mr. MONEY. No, sir.

Mr. MANNING. Then you do not know what increase of force should be made in that division?

For the information of the House I will read what the Third Assistant Postmaster-General said in his report made last year to the Forty-fifth Congress:

> The action of the last Congress relative to subletting or transfer of mail contracts, (act approved May 17, 1878,) whereby payments for mail service are made to the subcontractors, has more than quadrupled the work of the division of finance, and renders it absolutely necessary that the number of clerks of this division be increased. It is estimated that an increase of four will be sufficient to properly perform the additional labor imposed by said act.

Now, you will see upon the face of this report of the Assistant Postmaster-General—and I will be glad if the gentleman from Illinois will explain it if he can, for I perceive he is conversant with these matters—that four clerks only are asked for. It is said that the work of the finance division has been quadrupled. Now, we know the number of clerks in that division, and multiplying it by four we shall then find out what increase should be made.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. That is not the only increase he asks for.

Mr. MANNING. I have read all that he said on that subject.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. But since that report was made there has been legislation for special stamps for unpaid letter postage.

Mr. MANNING. The gentleman is not so familiar with this matter as I apprehended he was. For the benefit of the gentleman I will read what the Third Assistant Postmaster-General said only a few days ago. I suppose that will come within the scope of the recent law to which the gentleman refers.

It is due to myself to say that not until within the past few moments did I see this letter. I suggested to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ATKINS] that he should call for some specific information touching this matter. I have inquired of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] in vain for that information. I now go to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General to see if I can obtain any light from him. If the House will give attention while I read from his letter, members will see that he recedes from the position taken in the report submitted by him to the Postmaster-General and by the Postmaster-General transmitted to the Speaker of this House. He does not say now that the duties of that branch of the service have been quadrupled. This last law has been passed since he made the report in which he would have the House infer that the labors of this division have been increased. The man who now makes the report says that it is only trebled instead of quadrupled.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ATKINS. I will yield to the gentleman my time.

Mr. MANNING. I thank the gentleman. I understand that there are from eight to ten clerks in that division. Now, if the duties of the division have been quadrupled, then it would require four times that number of clerks, or from thirty-two to forty clerks.

Mr. MONEY. What is the date of the letter to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. MANNING. April 8.

Mr. MONEY. What is the date of the estimate?

Mr. MANNING. I do not know; I am reading from the letter of April 8, 1879.

Mr. ATKINS. The estimates were sent in on the 1st of December last, in connection with the printed report of the Postmaster-General of the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. MONEY. The report says that it quadrupled the work.

Mr. MANNING. No sir. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is right, then I would be glad to be set right myself. I want to know the facts before I vote for an increase of the clerical force in this division or in any other division. I go to your witness, and the presumption is that he knows the wants of his Department better than you or any other man on this floor. I have inquired of him through his letter, and I ask gentlemen to listen to what he says on that subject:

The act of May 17, 1878—

That is the act which is referred to here in the printed report:

The act of May 17, 1878, for the protection of subcontractors for mail service authorizes the payment of them directly upon their filing with the Department a copy of the subcontract with the original contractor.

Frequently many routes are held by a single contractor, and under the old system he was compensated for them all by a single draft or warrant.

He then goes on to talk about the increased work of this division, and says:

The depositing offices have more than trebled in number by the change.

The inference is that the work has been increased to that extent. Now I have this suggestion to make, and it is the only one I propose to present to the House, it is that when the Third Assistant Postmaster-General makes a report to this House he should know just what he wants and should be able to state intelligibly and advisedly what is needed. It does not appear that he has done so. If gentlemen can make it so appear, I would be glad to have them do it.

Mr. MONEY. I can make the House understand it; whether it will satisfy my colleague [Mr. MANNING] or not I cannot tell.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish simply to make a suggestion. I am pretty certain that this additional legislation will require some additional force. If the force that is now in the Post-Office Department should be confined in the future to only those labors that they have been confined to in the past, and if the Post-Office Department as well as all the other Departments of this Government should continue from day to day, and week to week, and month to month, and year to year, and from four years to four years, to disregard section 162 of the Revised Statutes, which requires the clerks in the Departments to be employed for ten hours a day from April to October and for eight hours a day from October until April—if they shall continue to disregard that section, then I am satisfied that this additional legislation will require some additional force.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MANNING] very pertinently remarked that this matter has not been subject to the examination of any committee; it has undergone no investigation. It comes to us simply by a letter from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, communicated, it is true, through a letter from the Postmaster-General. But no investigation has been had of this matter. While I am willing and anxious that the good of the service shall be promoted not only in this Department but in every other Department of the Government, I am not willing for so large an increase of force to be provided for until some further and better investigation of this matter has been had either by this House or by Congress.

The suggestion I rose to make is simply this: while I do not approve of the practice, have been opposed to it all the time, of the Senate offering amendments to appropriation bills, yet they constantly do so, whether I am opposed to it or whether this House opposes it; they have a way of their own. I suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi who offered this amendment [Mr. MONEY] to let the matter go over. And if in the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate or of the Post-Office Committee of the Senate, after they have looked into this matter and investigated it, it is deemed proper to provide for this additional force to perform the additional duties imposed by the recent act of Congress, then it can be done. But I would say that I think it likely that some additional force will be required.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, before I get through I desire to have read, for the information of the Committee of the Whole, the letter which has been talked about by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MANNING,] and only garbled.

Mr. MANNING. The remark of the gentleman from Illinois, when he speaks of my having "garbled" that letter, is entirely gratuitous. I have "garbled" nothing. I have read every sentence of the letter of the Assistant Postmaster-General bearing on this subject.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not yield to the gentleman; he declined to yield to me. If the word "garbled" is offensive to him I withdraw it, and I will say that he only read extracts from the letter when we ought to have read the whole of it.

The gentleman said he perceived I had no knowledge about this matter, though I professed to have knowledge.

Mr. MANNING. I did not say that.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Did you not?

Mr. MANNING. No, sir. I said I observed that the gentleman was not so familiar with the matter as I had hoped he was.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. And then the gentleman "sat down" on me before I could answer his question. [Laughter.]

I wish to say there has been additional legislation requiring this additional force; and I believe it ought to be granted. Personally I do not care any more than any other member of this House whether it be granted or not. I believe, however, that it will save money to the Government—ten, twenty, fifty times the amount it will cost. I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended until the letter of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General touching this subject can be read. It treats these points more concisely than I or my friend from Mississippi can do.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MCKENZIE. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The House ought to hear it.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I object.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then let the Clerk proceed with the reading, and I will see whether I cannot get the time necessary to read the whole of it.

The Clerk proceeded to read the letter, but before he had concluded——

The CHAIRMAN said: The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, obtained the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, at whose request the reading was continued until the hammer again fell.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, obtained the floor and said: I yield my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state there is no rule that allows yielding in this way.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then I ask the gentleman from Ohio to have the remainder of the letter read in his own time.

Mr. MILLS. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule regulating debate on amendments in Committee of the Whole allows five minutes on one side to a gentleman supporting an amendment and five minutes to some gentleman opposing it.

Mr. MILLS. I suggest that the letter be printed in the RECORD, so that we may see it to-morrow morning.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The letter is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 8, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a communication from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, requesting an increase of the clerical force of his office, and, for the reasons he has shown, to urgently recommend that his request be favorably considered by the House of Representatives in connection with the pending bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker House of Representatives.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., April 8, 1879.

SIR: On the 6th day of January last I had the honor to invite your attention to the inadequacy of the clerical force of this office to properly conduct the work devolving upon it. My communication was referred, with your favorable indorsement, to the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives; but no provision was made for an increase of force in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill of the late session of Congress, and which failed to become a law. As the bill (H. R. No. 2) is again about to be considered in the House of Representatives I beg to renew my recommendation of the date mentioned and to call attention, not only to the necessities existing at that time, but to those growing out of the subsequent legislation of Congress, as follows:

First. The act of May 17, 1878, for the protection of subcontractors for mail service authorizes payment to them directly upon their filing with the Department a copy of the subcontract with the original contractor. Frequently many routes are held by a single contractor; and under the old system he was compensated for them all by a single draft or warrant, while under the new law for each route there must be a draft in favor of the subcontractor and another for the original contractor for the balance remaining due of the contract price. The drafts and warrants which are issued by this office were thus multiplied in accordance with the number of routes held by single contractors and by the number of subcontractors employed under them. Again, collection orders are not issued on subcontractors for balances due by post-offices on their routes as is the case with original contractors performing service, and such offices are accordingly required to deposit their surplus funds with designated depository post-offices. The depositing offices have been more than trebled in number by the change. The deposit accounts are kept by this office while the collection orders are issued by the Auditor's; and hence any diminution that may occur in the latter does not offset the increase in the former so far as the labors of this office are concerned. The law is, however, an excellent one and goes far to protect a worthy class of servitors.

Second. On the 1st of October last, the registry system, previously confined to matter chargeable with letter rates of postage, was extended to third-class matter, a measure that has met with great popular favor and yielded no small revenue. It has, of course, increased the labors of the registry division; but, as it has been demonstrated that the registry system is a profitable one, there can be no economy in withholding the means required to conduct it efficiently.

Third. The act of June 23, 1874, for the collection of postage on second-class matter, provided that such matter should be weighed in bulk at the office of mailing, and the postage prepaid with a special adhesive stamp to be disposed of in the discretion of the Postmaster-General. Under the plan adopted the publisher or news agent is given a receipt for the amount of postage due on each consignment of matter, and the stamps are affixed to the stub of the receipt and canceled by the postmaster, who also enters on the stub a memorandum of the transaction, showing the weight and character of the matter and the amount of postage collected. The stubs, in book form, remain in the post-office, subject to production when called for. If the postmaster affixes and cancels the proper amount of stamps, the Department gets the proceeds, the stamps being charged to his account; but if he fails to do this, he is guilty, whether intentionally or not, of misappropriating the public money. There being reason to believe that many postmasters were thus guilty, some perhaps with criminal intent, but more from negligence, it was determined, early in the past winter, to require the return to the Department, as fast as they could be handled, of all stub-books in use since the law went into effect. The task promised to be no small one. There are about thirty-nine hundred cities and towns at which publications are issued, and the work involved an examination of every transaction with publishers and news agents for a period of four years. Thus far comparatively slight progress has been made, owing to the limited clerical force at command; but present results show the work to be a very profitable one. Many stub-books returned contain no stamps, although showing entries of collections in others, the stamps though affixed had not been canceled and might have been used again; and from not a few postmasters came urgent requisitions for stamps to remedy past delinquencies before answering the call for their books. In one case the books of an office, procured through a special agent, showed collections to the amount of $558.31 and stamps (but few of which were canceled) only to the amount of $246.87, a deficiency of $311.44, which the postmaster has been required to make up. In another instance, the failure of a postmaster to respond to repeated demands for his books led to a visit from a special agent and to the discovery not only of a delinquency in this particular matter but that he was a defaulter in both his postal and money-order accounts. The return of the stub-books, besides resulting in the collection of a large amount of revenue that would otherwise have been lost, will in the future have a most beneficial effect in insuring more prompt and faithful attention in a matter so largely dependent upon the discretion of postmasters and in which the Government has large interests at stake. It is to be hoped that the necessary help will be granted to secure an early completion of the work.

Fourth. Section 26 of the "act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," provides for a special stamp for the collection of partially prepaid postages at the office of delivery. At present this postage is collected in money, if at all, and its return to the Government depends upon whether the postmaster sees fit to charge himself with the amount in his account current. By affixing the special stamp before the delivery of the letter, under the new law, he must necessarily account for the proceeds, these stamps, like all others, being charged to him when issued. In addition to the labor imposed by the issuance of these stamps will be that of reporting credits to the Auditor for such of them as may be sent to the Dead-Letter Office on undelivered matter. The new law is sure to result advantageously to the postal revenues, and due means should be provided for carrying it into effect.

Fifth. By section 1 of the act referred to the Department is required to provide postal cards especially for international correspondence under the Paris treaty, and steps have already been taken toward their early introduction. Their issue will furnish a new element to the labors of this office.

Sixth. Under section 32 of the same act the Department is authorized, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, to issue stamped letter sheets, return postal cards, and return letter envelopes. Should it be decided to adopt these articles, or any of them, I beg that it be done in full view of the fact that their issue, liable as they are to be called for by every postmaster in the country, will be attended by a very large addition of clerical labor. If it was meant by Congress that the Department should avail itself of the authority conferred by the section there should be no hesitation in providing the means for carrying it into effect.

Seventh. In addition to the special causes already enumerated there is to be considered, also, the general increase of the business of the Department, as set forth in the annual reports. The registry business for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, shows an increase of 13 per cent. over the preceding year. The number of requisitions for postage-stamps, &c., filled during the year mentioned was 418,302, an increase of 28,064, or more than 7 per cent. The increase of business is general throughout the whole postal service, which must necessarily keep pace with the growth and development of the country.

In view of the foregoing, I would respectfully request that authority be granted for the employment of the following additional clerks in this office, namely: one of class 4, two of class 3, three of class 2, and three of class 1.

The modification in numbers from my recommendation of the 6th of January last is occasioned by legislation not then anticipated. In the present estimate I have taken account only of the labor that cannot be avoided, and have made no allowance for that which is left discretionary. The increase solicited is not in proportion to the increase of labor lately imposed, and is only about 6 per cent. of the number now employed. Except for the relief that is to be anticipated from the discontinuance of official postage-stamps a much larger increase would have been needed.

Regarding salaries, it will be observed in the appropriation bill that the office now has an undue proportion of clerks of the lower grades. This application is made with the single desire of best subserving the public interests; and as an evidence that the office is administered economically, I desire to quote the following paragraph in my last annual report:

"The appropriations for the service of this office during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, amounted to $1,151,150, and the expenditures to $752,232.01, leaving an unexpended balance of $398,917.99, or 34.6 per cent. of the appropriations. This large saving was principally due to the fact that shortly subsequent to the time the appropriations were made new contracts were entered into for adhesive postage-stamps, postal cards, and other supplies, at a large reduction from the old contract rates on which the appropriations were based."

I may also be permitted to state that at the last session of Congress every dollar of the estimates for this office was allowed by the Committee on Appropriations in reporting the Post-Office appropriation bill to the House of Representatives.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. D. HAZEN,
Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

Mr. ATKINS. If it is the wish of the committee to have a vote on this proposition now, I am willing. [Cries of "Oh, no!"] I move, then, that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FISHER, for two days;

To Mr. BALLOU, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family; and

To Mr. LOUNSBERY, for six days, on account of important business.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 11, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 9th instant, information in regard to the ruling of his Department relative to the transmission of the Citizen Soldier, a newspaper published in the city of Washington, through the mails at the same rates of postage accorded to other newspapers, &c.

Mr. FERRY. The chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is not in his seat. I hope the communication will be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communication will be printed and laid on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of Thomas N. McCaffrey, of Knox County, Tennessee, a lieutenant in Company D, Fourth Tennessee Infantry in the war of 1846, praying to be restored to the pension-roll; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALLACE presented the petition of John T. McDaniel and others, citizens of Carbon County, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of a law granting a pension to Aaron Snyder, late a private in Company A, Second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMLIN. I present certain resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Maine, relating to the termination of articles 18 and 21 of the treaty of 1871 with Great Britain, known as the treaty of Washington.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HAMLIN. I was about to remark, if the Chair will pardon me a single moment, that the resolutions favor the termination of those two articles in the treaty, and they instruct myself and colleague and request the members of the House from Maine to favor any legislation tending to that end. As I believe both my colleague and myself are in favor of the proposition we shall have no trouble in obeying the instructions in this case.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRIS. The select committee to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 108) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States, instructed me to refer the same to the National Board of Health for its investigation. It is reported back by the National Board of Health to the committee, and the committee instruct me to report the bill to the Senate. I move that it be reprinted and recommitted to the Select Commitee on Epidemic Diseases.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

Mr. GARLAND. I am instructed by the select committee to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases to report a joint resolution, and I ask its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) relating to the organization of the National Board of Health was read three times and passed, as follows:

Whereas the National Board of Health met in Washington on Tuesday, the 1st of April, 1879, and proceeded immediately to organize and act under the law establishing such board, and so continued from day to day until Saturday, the 5th of said month; and

Whereas the members in attendance who have been appointed on such board by the President, through inadvertance failed to take the oath of office prescribed by law, whereby the validity of the previous action of such board has been brought in question: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That such organization and action be, and the same is hereby, ratified, and that the members of such board shall be entitled to compensation just as if they had been duly qualified previously to entering upon their duties.

PENSIONS TO MEMBERS OF SIGNAL CORPS.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to the heirs of William McElroy, who died in Memphis, September 1, 1878, and of Joseph F. Tenney, who died at Vicksburgh, September 4, 1878, and of Joseph Cashel, who died in New Orleans, October 2, 1878, members of the Signal Corps, who lost their lives by yellow fever while courageously discharging their duties during the prevalence of that epidemic under such circumstances as seem to call for public recognition, and especially as some of the relatives, fathers and mothers, of the deceased are understood to be left in destitute conditions of life.

LEGISLATION ON APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further business for the morning hour? If not the Senate will proceed to the consideration of its unfinished business, being the Army appropriation bill, which under the understanding of yesterday will be informally laid aside, and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] will be recognized.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, I ask the Secretary to read the resolution on which I propose to address the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. HOAR on the 21st of March:

Resolved, That the refusal by one House of Congress to make necessary provision for the support of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, and for the defense of the country, except upon condition that the other House and the President shall give their assent to legislation which they disapprove, and the refusal by Congress to make such provision except upon condition that the President shall give such assent, are unconstitutional, revolutionary, and if persisted in must lead to the overthrow of constitutional government and the destruction of the national life.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia calls up for consideration the resolution just reported. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the same?

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, on the 21st of March the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] introduced into this body the resolution which has just been read. On the 25th of the same month he delivered in this presence an elaborate and carefully prepared speech, in which we find among other statements the following:

The purpose of our assembling is not chiefly a legislative purpose. It is, if I am right in my view of it, an attempt, by a simple but most effective process, to do away with that clause in the Constitution which provides that it shall be amended only by the assent of two-thirds of each House and three-fourths of the States, and that no amendment shall deprive any State of its equality in the Senate without its consent. The power which rightfully can be transferred from the President only by three-fourths of the States and from the Senate by the unanimous consent of all, it is proposed to get into the hands of one House by a very simple and effective process.

Further on he says:

It is now proposed to declare that neither he nor the judges shall receive this compensation—

Referring to their salaries—unless he will flatly violate this clause and sign a bill he does not approve. This is a scheme to coerce the President, not in his executive capacity, but in his function as a part of the Legislature.

This, Mr. President, is a remarkable resolution, and it was followed by a remarkable speech; a speech especially remarkable coming from the source it does. What is the question presented to us? What is it that is unconstitutional and revolutionary? The last House of Representatives had before it two bills; one for the support of the Army upon which after making all the necessary appropriations it ingrafted a provision providing in substance that no part of the Army should on the day of election be at a place where any general or special election is being held in a State "unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States," and which further imposes a penalty for a violation of the provision.

The House of Representatives also had before it another bill, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government. All the money for the support of the Government was appropriated that was asked for—the last dollar. To that bill was attached the repeal of the iron-clad oath which jurors in the United States courts may be required to take at the will of the judge presiding, by which nine-tenths of all the white men in the States lately composing the southern confederacy are excluded from the jury-box; and, also, another provision repealing certain provisions authorizing the appointment and pay of supervisors of elections and deputy marshals for the same purpose. This attempt to keep the Army away from the polls and to give a free and a fair jury, a free and a fair election, is what is called unconstitutional and revolutionary, in the language of the Senator's resolution.

The gravamen of his charge is not that it is wrong, revolutionary, or unconstitutional to repeal these obnoxious laws, but that it is unconstitutional and revolutionary to add such provisions to an appropriation bill, and "if persisted in," he says, "must lead to the overthrow of constitutional government and the destruction of the national life."

Mr. President, this, as I said before, is a remarkable speech coming from the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] who in 1872, with his colleague, [Mr. DAWES,] whom I see sitting before me to-day, were members of the House of Representatives. What is the history of this subject of tacking general legislation on appropriation bills? I shall not take the time of the Senate to run over them and cite any considerable number of cases. I shall only cite a few prominent ones here and there, commencing first with the bill that was originated in the House of Representatives in 1872, making appropriations for the sundry civil service of the Government to which a provision was added by the Senate which extended the law appointing these supervisors all over the country. Prior to that date these supervisors, as the law then stood, could only be appointed in cities containing over twenty thousand inhabitants, but that did not answer the purpose. They sought to extend this as I believe unconstitutional legislation, and if I had the time I could show it to be so, all over this country and to supervise all elections at which a member of Congress or a President was to be elected.

Let us see the history of that legislation. Bear in mind that this was in 1872. The bill passed the House in 1872 without any such provision upon it. It came to this body, and what was done? The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] offered what was known as the Kellogg amendment, by which the law concerning these supervisors, instead of being confined to cities of twenty thousand inhabitants, as I said before, was extended all over the country. After a long discussion upon that, and during a good portion of the time even the five-minute rule was enforced, a vote was had, and who voted to attach that legislation, thus declaring the provision to be right? Every member of the republican party who had a seat upon the floor of the Senate, without one single exception, voted in favor of keeping that provision in the bill.

Then it went to the House. There a long discussion took place upon it, and I am sorry to say that in the passage of that appropriation bill with that amendment upon it a proceeding took place which I think is disgraceful to the American Congress. What was it? When the minority in that House, as I shall show in a moment, had it in their power by legitimate parliamentary law to defeat the passage of the bill rather than have such an obnoxious measure as that tacked on to it, they were induced to give over what is generally known as filibustering and to let the bill go to a committee of conference with an assurance that the obnoxious legislation should be stricken out. The democratic members of the House of Representatives were told to stop their filibustering and let the bill go to a committee of conference, and there the amendment would be stricken out and no such law as that should be fastened upon the country. This is not simply my assertion. I will now read, Mr. President, if the Senate will give me their attention, the language of one who has long belonged to the republican party, who has been a prominent and respected member of it longer, perhaps, than any Senator on this floor. What does he say? After the bill went to a conference committee and the committee reported to both bodies contrary to the pledge, contrary to the understanding, retaining this obnoxious measure, by both conference committees, the one of the Senate and the other of the House, when it went to the House WILLIAM D. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, rose in his seat and said what I shall read. I call the attention of Senators to this to show not only how this legislation has been put upon an appropriation bill, but that it was put upon it, to say the least of it, in a very improper manner. I shall not use as strong language in my place to-day as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. KELLEY, does:

Mr. Speaker, I now move that the report of the committee of conference be recommitted to that committee. I make this motion under a deep sense of responsibility, and I ask gentlemen to hear me for my cause and to be silent that they may hear. I make it and propose to briefly sustain it in behalf of a cause that is as dear to me as my life, to which I have devoted my best years, and in which I have more than once periled my life; that is, the integrity and supremacy of the republican party, which I believe to be endangered by the position of this bill. I am also constrained to make this motion by a proper sense of self-respect. Nothing will reward a man for the loss of self-respect. I feel this morning that if by the force of a mere majority we drive this bill, embodying as it does the enforcement amendment, through Congress, we will commit an act—

That is the way he denounced it—which, so far as I and a number of gentlemen around me are concerned—

Alluding to his republican associates—

will be regarded as in the category of acts for which I have more than a score of times sentenced men, theretofore respected in the community in which they lived, to solitary confinement and penal labor.

That is the manner in which this widespread amendment upon an appropriation bill was gotten through the House of Representatives. That is the language used by a republican member of the body.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the honorable Senator permit me to interrupt him with a question?

Mr. HEREFORD. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand the Senator from West Virginia to say that upon some sort of representation the democrats were induced to give up filibustering to prevent the enactment of the law. Why did they not filibuster against the conference report? They lost no rights in the way of filibustering. The right to filibuster was just as open when the conference report came back as before it was made. What particular motive was it that induced the democrats to give up filibustering at one stage of the legislation and not resort to it at the other?

Mr. HEREFORD. It seems to me that the Senator from Maine ought to know better than I can tell him. The Senator from Maine at that time was Speaker of the House; I was a member of that body; and the Senator from Maine recollects the ruling that he made upon that occasion when the bill came from the conference committee. That is the reason.

Mr. BLAINE. What ruling?

Mr. HEREFORD. That they could not filibuster to the extent that they could prior to that time.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no——

Mr. HEREFORD. I have the whole matter right here before me.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator is mistaken. The only ruling that was made was that it was not in order to lay a conference report on the table, but the ordinary filibustering motions to adjourn and to fix the day to which the House should adjourn were then just as open as before.

Mr. HEREFORD. The Senator from Maine must recollect that when Mr. Eldredge had the floor and had made a motion to take a recess, he as Speaker ruled that he could be taken from the floor, and Mr. GARFIELD who then had the report in his charge brought it up before the House. He even took Mr. Eldredge from the floor when he had made a motion to take a recess so that Mr. GARFIELD, the chairman of the committee of conference on the part of the House, could take up for action the report of the conference committee, thus expediting the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will allow me, that is the express rule of the House; but when the conference report is made then all motions are in order just as much as before. That privilege only goes to making the conference report. I repeat, the honorable Senator must have forgotten that the power to filibuster against a conference report was just as open as against any other proposition before the House.

Mr. HEREFORD. It seemed not, Mr. President. I do not desire to be drawn from the line of my argument to enter into a discussion of the rules of the House, or the enforcement of them, and I am not complaining of that at present. Let us go on a little further.

I desire in this humble way of mine to call the attention of the whole country to the manner in which this legislation has been forced upon us not only upon an appropriation bill, the repeal of which is now denounced as revolutionary, but in another way which I shall now attempt to bring before the Senate.

This bill—

Mr. KELLEY goes on to say—

This bill reached its present stage by what, in the light of information in my possession, appears to be false pretenses—

And we will find directly what these false pretenses were; consequently this law became one by false pretenses, in the language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania—

false pretenses, which are characterized by all the features necessary to sustain a conviction under the law of Pennsylvania. On Saturday last the minority of this House, by virtue of parliamentary law and of the usages of this House; not by the weakness of the republican party, not by the weakness or lack of fidelity on the part of members of the republican party, but, as I have said, by virtue of parliamentary law and usages long and well known to the House and the people of the country, the minority party of this House held this bill in its power. Leading members of that body—

That is, of the democratic party—

said to us—

That is, the republican party—

"Take from the bill one amendment and you may have all the other provisions without question; take from it one provision, and you may complete your appropriations and adjourn." This being the condition of the bill, there came upon this floor—

Now listen, Senators—there came upon this floor—

That is, upon the floor of the House—

a Senator who was then a member of the committee of conference to consider and adjust the disagreeing votes thereon, and I vouch gentlemen around me for the fact that from him went forth the assurance that if the opposition would permit this bill to go to a committee of conference the Senate would recede from the objectionable amendment. It was also known that he who must be chairman of the committee of conference on the part of the House—

Meaning Mr. GARFIELD, who was then a member of the House—

disapproved of that amendment, and had given open and public assurance that he disapproved it as heartily as gentlemen on the other side could do.

Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio. If the gentleman refers to me I beg him to withhold his statement of my position and allow me to make it for myself.

Mr. RANDALL—

Who is now the Speaker of the House—

Mr. RANDALL. You did state that privately.

Mr. KELLEY. I am assured by many gentlemen that the gentleman from Ohio did make such statements.

Then Mr. Eldredge, a member from Wisconsin, also rose in his seat and said that the pledge was made to him and to Mr. RANDALL and other gentlemen, who were leaders on the part of the democrats of that body. Now, then, what did Mr. KELLEY further say?

According to parliamentary usage there must be two democrats on a committee of conference, one from the House and one from the Senate. There was, therefore, it seemed to me as it did to others, no possibility that the objectionable amendment would be adhered to. And I and others who are as loyal to republicanism, loyal to radical republicanism as I am or ever have been, (and it is among the proudest recollections of my life that Abraham Lincoln, Thaddeus Stevens, and Henry Winter Davis have all at times chidden me for my excessive radicalism, my undue zeal, and what they were pleased to regard as my reckless course in support of the cause of the oppressed and enslaved,) I say, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen who are as radical as I am went with or in advance of me to gentlemen on the other side of the House and said—

This was the assurance that we had—

"The circumstances are such as guarantee the withdrawal of this amendment to which you object; you cannot be deceived should you let the bill go to a conference."

It was by those assurances by Mr. KELLEY, and the fact that Mr. GARFIELD was also one of the leaders of his party there and was to be the chairman of the committee of conference and was also opposed to it, that they knew that if these facts were true, and that if they were not deceived by the Senator who went from this Chamber over there and who was on the committee of conference that the measure must necessarily fail in conference, and therefore if the pledge had been carried out it would not have been on the statute-book to-day. Mr. KELLEY goes on further to say:

I pledged my influence, following gentlemen whom I saw on the other side promising theirs. And I reiterate that I was impelled thereto by assurances given, as I had been informed by many gentlemen about me—by a member of the Senate conference committee that if we could get the bill to the conference committee the Senate would recede.

Of course referring to his republican associates—

Under that pledge and under that promise this measure became a law. It never could have become a law if we had not had this assurance; and yet, notwithstanding that was announced there on the floor of the House that that was the pledge and promise, that general legislation was tacked upon an appropriation bill, and yet every republican with one exception voted for it, and said that it was right. It was not revolutionary then. But to-day we are told, when we seek to repeal that identical law and some others equally or perhaps more obnoxious than it, that it is revolutionary and unconstitutional to attempt such a course as this.

Mr. President, I have read to you and the Senate, from the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, a very elaborately prepared and very excellent speech, showing great research, great familiarity with the constitutional law and history of England. We heard from him, as I said, that this was an unusual thing. He said in that speech:

In 1856 a provision was ingrafted upon the Army bill that no part of the Army should be used to enforce the enactments of the Legislative Assembly at Shawnee Mission, in Kansas, until Congress had determined as to their validity, &c.

Again, lower down, he says:

On one other occasion only has any similar attempt been made.

Why, Mr. President, he says, speaking from the record, that there have been but two attempts to pass general legislation on appropriation bills. Let us see what the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] said when this very provision was up in the Senate in 1872. Senator ANTHONY rose in his seat and said:

We all know that a large part of the legislation since I have been in Congress for twelve or thirteen years, has been put on appropriation bills.

A large part of the legislation of Congress during the twelve or thirteen years he had then been here had been put on appropriation bills, and yet we are told by the Senator from Massachusetts that he knows of but two instances, and he there refers to them.

Mr. DAWES. My colleague is not present or I would not venture to suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that he does not quite fairly state my colleague's argument. If I understood the argument it was, not that there had been but two instances of the putting of general legislation upon appropriation bills, but that there had only been since 1856 two occasions when there was an attempt to force the Executive to approve an appropriation bill containing legislation which he would not otherwise approve of. If the Senator will refer to my colleague's resolution on which he is commenting, he will see that the operative words are making it a condition upon which the approval of the Executive can be obtained to an appropriation to carry on the business of the Government. That is the argument of my colleague. It is not the argument of my colleague, either, that it is unconstitutional to put legislation upon an appropriation bill or that it never had been done since 1856 except in those two instances. My colleague alluded to the fact that it had been quite often done; he alluded to the fact which every Senator must take notice of, that while it has been done and indulged in by different parties, it has always been deprecated because it led directly to the condition of things now existing, namely, an attempt to put that upon an appropriation bill without which those putting it there say that the appropriations for carrying on the Government shall not be made.

I hope my friend from West Virginia, in the absence of my colleague, will keep in view his exact argument.

Mr. HEREFORD. I have read the speech of the Senator's colleague very carefully and very frequently, and I also heard it delivered. I do not think, if any one will take that speech and read the whole of it, take the animus, the main idea running through all of it, he will say that I in the least have colored or misrepresented the thought running all the way through it.

Now, Mr. President, to pass from that, I said I should not cite anything like all the precedents in regard to tacking general legislation on appropriation bills, because if I did to-day's sun would set before I should take my seat. I shall cite only a few notable instances. I will now go back to 1855 and show how men of all parties have voted. In other words, all there is in this question is simply this: when any political party believes that certain legislation is right and that it is necessary in order to get it enacted into a law to tack it on to an appropriation bill, they do so. The only question with them is, Is the proposed legislation right? In 1855, when there were giants in this Senate—not to say that there are not now, for I believe this Senate is as able as perhaps any that has preceded it, but there were here then men who were recognized as intellectual giants both in the great whig party and in the great democratic party.

In 1855 there was tacked on to what was known as the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill in the House of Representatives an entire revision of the tariff, not a particular part or a particular item, but an entire revision of the whole tariff. It passed the House with comparative unanimity, and it came to the Senate; and after a long discussion, many speeches being made on the propriety of such legislation, a motion was made to strike out the tariff provision. All this argument was gone over whether it was revolutionary or right or wrong to put such general legislation on appropriation bills; and then there was a motion made after the bill had been reported by the Committee on Finance, of which Mr. R. M. T. Hunter, of Virginia, was chairman, to strike out the part relating to the tariff. The motion was made by Mr. Clayton, of Delaware, to strike the tariff provisions from the bill. Mr. Toombs, of Georgia, who then occupied a seat on this floor, called for the yeas and nays, and what was the vote? The vote stood twenty-four in favor of the motion to strike out and twenty-one against it, only three votes difference. Who were the twenty-one? We find there voting in favor of this character of legislation against striking the provision off the bill—

Messrs. Adams, Butler, Chase—

Salmon P. Chase, afterwards Chief-Justice of the United States—

Clay, Dawson, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Gillette, Hunter, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Mason, Morton, Sebastian, Slidell, Sumner, Toombs, Toucey, Walker, Wells, and Wilson—21.

Both the Senators from Massachusetts then upon this floor, Sumner and Wilson, voted against striking out the provision which revised the whole tariff laws of the United States on an appropriation bill, thereby saying that it was proper legislation on such a bill.

But passing on to the second session of the Forty-third Congress, we find on the sundry civil bill, in March, 1875, similar legislation was had.

Again I hold in my hand a law of the United States, public act No. 152 of the Forty-fourth Congress, first session, "an act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," and I find upon that bill this general legislation which I will read, because it is specially appropriate just now, particularly when we take into view the testimony that has been taken by what is known as the Wallace-Teller committee:

SEC. 6. That all executive officers or employés of the United States not appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, are prohibited from requesting, giving to, or receiving from, any other officer or employé of the Government, any money or property or other thing of value for political purposes; and any such officer or employé, who shall offend against the provisions of this section shall be at once discharged from the service of the United States; and he shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $500.

That was general legislation tacked upon an appropriation bill; and what is the testimony taken before this committee? That the late Secretary of the Senate—and personally I have nothing to say against him, for I have known him for a quarter of a century, and as a man I esteem him highly—a United States officer within the purview of that statute, called upon all the employés in all the Departments of this Government in Washington City and elsewhere for contributions for political purposes in the last congressional election, and those parties paid the contributions asked for to the amount of about $93,000.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me a moment? I desire to suggest that the Secretary of the Senate is not an officer of the United States within the meaning of that statute.

Mr. HEREFORD. There is where the Senator from Wisconsin and myself differ. I think he is a United States officer——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. By no means. He is an officer of the Senate, not an officer of the United States at all.

Mr. HEREFORD. He certainly is not an officer of a State; he certainly is not an officer of the District of Columbia; he certainly is not an officer of a Territory.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. He was Secretary of the Senate; that, and nothing else.

Mr. HEREFORD. Yet all the employés in these Departments here come within the provision of the law, and it is made a penal offense for them to give a dollar for such purposes when thus called upon. The law says they shall be discharged for doing it, and yet they are all in these Departments to-day. The law further says that they are guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined a sum not exceeding $500; and yet they are here in your various Departments by thousands, the last one of them who gave money for this purpose under this call from the secretary of the congressional republican committee, every one of them liable to be discharged, liable to be tried in the courts of the country; and it is made the duty of the President of the United States, especially under his civil-service reform, to throw every one of them out of office, to discharge them instantly from office. Yet in violation of this law thus tacked upon an appropriation bill every one of them still retains his office and his position. They are retained there for the purpose when another campaign shall come to call upon them for other assessments for like purposes. They were to be removed under the law of the land if they complied with the request; they would have been removed if they had not complied with it under political dictation.

Mr. Gorham swears before this committee that he collected altogether $106,000, $13,000 from some wealthy gentlemen in the State of New York, and $93,000 from these parties, these employés; and he goes on in that testimony of his to show to what purposes he appropriated the money, where he sent it. In that testimony it is shown that he sent $500 of it to the third congressional district of West Virginia, where the republicans did not even have a candidate, but for the purpose of indirectly electing a person who was a candidate on the greenback ticket. Three hundred and fifty dollars was also sent to the second congressional district of our State.

I was showing a moment ago what were the sentiments of gentlemen distinguished for their ability, distinguished for their knowledge of parliamentary law, what their votes were, what they thought of this character of legislation. Let us come one year nearer to us; and I desire to commend what I have to say on this subject especially to my friends of the republican side of the Senate. If we are engaged in improper legislation, we have learned the lesson at their feet. We have been told that if the wheels of Government are stopped by this character of legislation, if we should pass this bill and it should go to the President and he should veto it and the wheels of Government should be stopped, we are the revolutionists, we are the obstructionists, that the responsibility is with us. We were told by the Senator from Massachusetts, not now in his seat, [Mr. HOAR,] at the last session, that because the other House had put such a provision as this upon an appropriation bill and insisted upon it remaining there, if the bill failed the responsibility would be with the House of Representatives, not with the Senate. That is what we were told then. That is what we were told here day after day, night after night, that the responsibility was with us. But now let me commend to my friends a little of the history of 1856.

A bill was up before the House of Representatives for the support of the Army, just such a bill as we have before us and did have last session. The republicans had a majority in that House, and they placed upon that Army bill a provision that the Army should not be used for certain purposes, directing in the appropriation bill how the Army should be used, how its officers and men should be used. That is all we seek to do by this pending bill or by any of this legislation on either of the bills. We are only seeking to direct the manner in which the moneys appropriated shall be expended and controlled. Congress has the power. That provision was passed in 1856 by the House of Representatives and came to the Senate. The House of Representatives was republican; the Senate was democratic. The two Houses divided, and the question came up as to the right of the members of the House of Representatives to legislate thus. The question arose also, if the appropriation bill should fail, who would be responsible. You will find in the Appendix to the Congressional Globe of the first session of the Thirty-fourth Congress, on page 1089, this. I shall quote from Mr. Wade, a Senator from Ohio, who often occupied your chair, sir. What did he say on this subject as to the right of the House of Representatives to originate such legislation? What did he say as to where the responsibility rested? We are to go before the people if these bills shall fail, and there we shall answer as to who is responsible for the failure of the appropriations. I will read first from Mr. Wilson, afterward Vice-President:

Mr. President, I cannot permit this vote to be taken without uttering my protest in opposition to raising an issue with the House of Representatives upon this bill. The Senator from Virginia tells us that when one House undertakes to force its opinion upon the other, and that policy is adhered to, revolution follows:

That is what we are told now. But what did Mr. Wilson say to it?

Now, sir, it appears to me that the Senate is raising this question with the House of Representatives; and that if, in the result, this bill shall fail, the responsibility of that failure will rest upon the Senate, and not upon the House of Representatives.

And so, if this bill shall fail after having been passed by the two Houses, both concurring, and it shall fail by a veto, the responsibility will rest with the Executive. We appropriate all the money that is asked, but we only seek to direct the manner in which it shall be used. What more did Mr. Wilson say?

It seems to me that the provision now proposed to be stricken out by the Committee on Finance is a legitimate proposition—

It was one seeking to control the Army—and one which the House of Representatives had an undoubted right to incorporate into the bill.

And furthermore he said:

Sir, the country will condemn it—the country will condemn—it must condemn—this action of the Senate, this arrogant attempt to force its opinions upon the House of Representatives.

The action of the Senate in striking out the restriction—

That was the manner in which Mr. Wilson denounced the attempt on the part of the Senate to dictate to the House of Representatives. Let us go on a little further to what Mr. Wade said in the same debate:

Must the people's House of Representatives sit with their arms folded, and, although the Constitution of the United States confers emphatically upon them the power to originate all revenue bills, (which comprises the power to place these grants of money on such condition as they see fit,) must they refrain from exercising their authority in an emergency like this? Is this the liberty of the American citizen that the people's House—where there really is a representation of the people, where the wisdom of the fathers placed the taxing power—are leading to revolution by annexing a condition to the appropriation of the people's money.

Annexing a condition to the appropriation of the people's money—appropriate language for the present occasion! But he goes on further to say more emphatically:

I say the House of Representatives have done right. They have inserted no provision in this bill but what may be defended now and hereafter, before any just earthly tribunal, and before the Almighty God. There is not a single article in the proviso proposed to be stricken out which does not meet the approbation of every just and unprejudiced man. The House of Representatives, representing a vast majority of the people, in view of these enormities, endeavoring to put some slight, though I admit inadequate, check on them, have offered you this mild and equitable restraint on the Executive.

And yet we are told that we are putting a restraint upon the Executive, and if we attempt it, it is revolution! Mr. Wade continues:

Here we are told it is revolutionary, and therefore we must not breathe the breath of life into their action, but must permit it to go back to the House with an appeal to the House to recede. Sir, I do not know but that you may succeed under the idea that this is revolution; but, so help me God! I hope that the man who proposes to recede a hair's breadth from the action of the House will never find his way back again; and I do not believe he will.

Let us go a little further and see what the lights, the fathers of the republican party said, on this subject of the power of the House of Representatives and where the responsibility rested. If we are engaged in revolution, we have been taught it from the lips of these gentlemen from whom I have just read and from their action in this country. I will now read still more from Mr. Wade:

Has it come to this, that if the House of Representatives do not think proper to frame a bill for the support of the Army of the country, appropriating $12,000,000, in a way to satisfy the majority in this body, revolution shall follow, and the responsibility be upon the House? Pray, sir, how? Because they will not agree to do as the Senate tells them they shall do. That is the naked proposition before the Senate, with the explanation which has been made in reference to it, that the Senate of the United States is prepared to say to the House of Representatives "unless you will appropriate money to aid the President of the United States in the enforcement of disputed laws in the Territory of Kansas, no appropriation for the support of the Army shall be made." This is a fair proposition that is sent here by the House of Representatives, and it is sought to be encumbered by an amendment offered in this body, which is to defeat the bill unless the House of Representatives will recede from a portion of the bill which they passed. You cannot change the issue. The responsibility is here.

Consequently, if this legislation which we are seeking at this session to make, these laws we are seeking to enact, shall fail, the responsibility is not here but elsewhere.

The House of Representatives have shown their willingness by the passage of this bill—

See how it applies to the present case—

by the passage of this bill to provide for the support of the Army. The country see that the House of Representatives are prepared to vote millions of money to sustain the Army of the United States. But because they are not willing to frame that bill so as to satisfy particular views in this body the whole bill is to be defeated, if I understand the views of the Senator from Virginia, who has proposed the amendment.

But let us pass on further; and now I read the remarks of one whom although I did not know him personally but from what I have read of his speeches and of his discussions I have regarded as one of the first men that ever enjoyed the honor of a seat in this Chamber; I mean Mr. Fessenden. What did he say upon this very subject? This was his language in reply to an argument somewhat similar to the one that the Senator from Massachusetts has made here referring to the parliamentary law of England and the constitutional history of England. Mr. Fessenden was one of the best parliamentarians, one of the soundest men, one of the most conservative men of the republican party that ever occupied a seat here. Replying to Mr. Hunter, Mr. Fessenden said:

Does he not know well that in the English Parliament from the earliest times not only have appropriation and revenue bills gone together, but in cases without number it has been the habit of that Parliament to check the power of the Crown by annexing conditions to their appropriations of money? It is not only not a new thing, but a very common thing, in the history of all parliaments. Does he not know that the only mode in which our ancestors—

And I commend this to the Senator from Massachusetts—

Does he not know that the only mode in which our ancestors of Massachusetts checked the powers of their royal governors was by granting money only on conditions? The power of supply and the power of annexing conditions to supply have always gone together in parliamentary history; and their joint exercise has never been denounced as a case of revolution, or calling for revolution, or tending to produce revolution in any shape or form whatever.

Sir, it is a power essential to the preservation of our liberties.

And so say we to-day, that it is a power essential to the preservation of the liberties of this country that Congress in appropriating money shall say how it shall be used; that we shall place limitations upon it. So said Mr. Fessenden in 1856. He further said:

We do not wish to dissolve this Government; but unless we would destroy it we must point out the mode in which the money we grant is to be used, or else submit to any use of it that the Commander-in-Chief may choose to select. It is the peculiar prerogative and right of Congress to control the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and to control the Army which they raise. Do gentlemen argue here that our only business is to make the appropriations for the support of the Army and not question the use that is to be made of them? that we cannot annex any conditions to our grants of money—a power that has always been claimed as essential to freedom from the beginning of English liberty, which we inherit, and from the beginning of legislation in this country? Sir, the idea that we cannot annex conditions of that kind restraining the power of our military officers is a notion that if admitted would reduce us to worse than colonial bondage.

And yet we are told to-day that this is revolutionary!

It is the only protection we have, unless we choose to do in fact what the gentleman from Virginia says we must necessarily be considered as doing when we affix any condition of this kind to a grant of money—initiate a revolution.

He goes on further to say:

Mr. President, I have been surprised at the positions taken by honorable Senators on the other side. I know that no man is more learned in the history of parliaments, especially with regard to money grants and money powers, than the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. Hunter,] and yet he gravely argues that the House of Representatives—the power exclusively invested by the Constitution with the prerogative of raising money—not exclusively of expending it, I grant, but still from the very nature of its existence, as deriving its powers more immediately from the people, and from the short term of office which it holds, and its frequent return to the people, necessarily more trusted by the people, with reference to the expenditure of money, than we are—and a House elected with reference to this particular measure has not the power, without committing a revolutionary act, to say that the funds which it grants, and is willing to grant, must be restrained to effect what it believes to be constitutional and legal and proper objects in their application. When I hear him say this I am astonished, because he goes counter to all the history of money grants by free parliaments from the creation of the world down to the present time.

That was the language of one of the most accomplished men who ever occupied a seat on this floor. It is a better answer to the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts in regard to the parliamentary law of England than I could make.

But, Mr. President, I shall not stop there. If any one man was more than another the creator and founder of the republican party it was the man from whom I shall now read, a distinguished predecessor of the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] who sits before me. I mean Mr. William H. Seward. What did he say of the right and power of the House of Representatives to tack general legislation upon appropriation bills? What did he assert as to the power of the House of Representatives to say how the money shall be used that they are appropriating? This is the language of Mr. Seward in the same debate:

Since the House of Representatives has power to pass such a bill distinctly, it has power, also, to place an equivalent prohibition in any bill which it has constitutional power to pass. And so it has a constitutional right to place the prohibition in the annual Army appropriation bill.

I grant that this mode of reaching the object proposed is in some respects an unusual one, and in some respects an inconvenient one. It is not, therefore, however, an unconstitutional one, or even necessarily a wrong one.

It is a right one—

As I said in the opening of my speech, that is all there is in this question.

It is a right one if it is necessary to effect the object desired, and if that object is one that is in itself just and eminently important to the peace and happiness of the country or to the security of the liberties of the people.

The House of Representatives, moreover, is entitled to judge and determine for itself whether the proceeding is thus necessary, or whether the object of it is thus important.

The members of the House of Representatives come directly from the people; it is entitled to judge of the propriety or the necessity of such legislation, and of how the money of the people which they are voting away shall be used; and yet we have been told on the floor of the Senate that this is revolution; and the Senator from Massachusetts says we are seeking to bring about another revolution. Mr. President, this legislation may be revolution, but it is a counter-revolution; it is to bring us back to where we were. That is all there is of it. The only point is, is it right? Is it right to give to the people of this country a free and fair jury? Take the practical effect of the bill; go down into the Southern States, all over them, and see how it is under the law as it stands to-day, and which is sought to be repealed by one of the bills which was thus denounced by the Senator from Massachusetts. Under the law as it stands to-day it is in the power of the judge, in the power of one man, to offer to any gentleman who may be summoned as a juror what is known as the iron-clad oath, and if he cannot take that he must stand aside, thus driving from the jury-box nine-tenths of all the white men in the Southern States.

I ask the Senators who hear me is that right, or is it right to repeal it and let there be the same law all over this country that shall exclude no man who is competent to sit on a jury by reason of his intellect, his intelligence, or the non-commission of crime? Why seek to keep this law upon the statute-book to drive from the jury-box nine-tenths of all the white men in the South, and thus keep up a continual and a growing agitation in the South? Why seek to heap upon the southern people this badge of degradation? What is the practical effect of the working of this law? There are United States judges down South who were confederate officers. Go to Virginia. There is Judge Hughes, an excellent gentleman, making a good judge. He was a confederate officer. He cannot take the iron-clad oath himself. He has been appointed by the President. But when a man comes up before him to be sworn as a juror to try a case involving $500 or $1,000, it is in his power to stick at him the iron-clad oath which he cannot take himself, and say, "By reason of that you shall not sit on a jury to try this case although I am a judge here and cannot take the same oath myself."

But what is the practical operation of the law further? Even district attorneys who have been appointed by the President of the United States, some of them I know, many of them perhaps, were officers in the confederate service, and they are now United States district attorneys, and cannot take the iron-clad oath; but some of them suggest—they have the power to suggest—to the presiding judge, who was also a confederate officer and cannot take the oath, that this man who now comes up to be sworn as a juror shall have that oath administered to him. The oath is read. He cannot take it; the man must stand aside, because he cannot take an oath which neither the judge nor the district attorney can take. I ask Senators if that is a right law, and if it is not proper to repeal it? That is what we are seeking to do by the legislation which we have before us, and which we have had before us for weeks.

But I must hurry on, Mr. President. I asked a moment ago what are the practical operations of these laws in a financial point of view? What was the amount of money that was paid to United States marshals and supervisors of election for services at the election held in the city of New York, November 5, 1872, in one city? Who are these United States marshals and deputy marshals? Who are these chief supervisors, headed by Johnny Davenport, and the deputy supervisors, all of them belonging to one political party, carrying on the day of election on their left breast the badge of a United States officer, and holding in their right hand the tickets of the republican party? And that is free government; that is free election! We seek to repeal it. Are we not right? Should the President veto such a bill?

Not only were all these deputy United States marshals and United States supervisors appointed, but there was spent in the city of New York alone in 1876, there was paid to these supervisors, there was paid to these deputy marshals, at one election in one city the enormous sum of $85,555. Those were the usual expenses, the salaries paid them for their services in distributing tickets; and for extraordinary expenses in the same city at the same time $15,132.20; or in round numbers at one election in the city of New York the General Government paid to republican supervisors of election and republican deputy marshals the round sum of $100,000. We seek to repeal that. We seek to give both the great political parties an even chance before the people. Has it come to this, that the power of the Government and the money of the people shall be used for the purpose of controlling the votes of the people? We say no, and therefore we seek to repeal this law, and for that we are charged with being revolutionists.

So much for the year 1876 as far as the money was concerned. Now how many deputy marshals were there? I have before me Attorney-General Taft's report and he said that for that same election the number of deputy marshals for the State of New York was thirty-five hundred and five for one election in that State and for the city of New York alone there were twenty-five hundred United States deputy marshals paid $5 a day on the day of election; but as I said a moment ago, with this money in their pockets and the badge "U. S. marshal" on their left breast, showing that they had the power of the Government behind them, in their right hand they were carrying the republican ticket, I ask if that is a fair and free election. No, Mr. President. There were appointed for the whole United States for the same year 11,615 deputy marshals clothed with all these powers, the power of arrest. We sometimes hear the subject discussed in this Hall and in the other Hall as to the reduction of the standing Army. Why here is improvised for one election throughout the United States a great army of United States deputy marshals paid $5 a day for their services for the party, not to preserve the peace!

The whole expense for deputy marshals and supervisors that year was pretty well on to $300,000, paid out by the General Government in 1876 for United States deputy marshals and supervisors of election, and all of them republicans. That is one of the laws we seek to repeal. We believe the country will sustain us in the attempt. There was paid that year the total sum of nearly $300,000 for United States deputy marshals and supervisors of election. Think of it!

Now let us come to the year 1878, the year of the last congressional election, and see a little further the operations of this iniquitous law. I hold in my hand the report of the present Secretary of the Treasury in answer to a Senate resolution of March 21, 1879, in relation to the accounts of the marshals of the United States in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Massachusetts, and Maryland, and in that he shows that there were appointed in the year 1878 for the State of New York twenty-one hundred and seventy-nine United States deputy marshals, for the city of New York alone twelve hundred and seventy-six deputy marshals, and there was paid for the same year to United States supervisors $51,000, to United States deputy marshals $38,647, making all told that year $89,647 in this State according to this report.

To sum the whole matter up we have, for the city of New York alone, deputy marshals twelve hundred and seventy-nine; amount of money expended in that city alone, as shown by this same report, the enormous sum of $55,680.

But now I come to another branch of the subject. Worse than all, these deputy marshals and these United States supervisors, the two operating and acting together, had the power to arrest. What occurred in the election in 1878 in the city of New York, as shown by the report which I hold before me, a report made by Mr. Lynde, and in which is the testimony of John I. Davenport, and from that it appears that on election day in 1878 under this law which we are seeking to repeal, there were complaints made under the direction of this man Davenport, who was United States circuit court clerk, United States commissioner, and by being United States commissioner he has been appointed the chief supervisor in the city of New York under this law, holding these three offices. He directed, as is shown by this report and his own testimony, on the day of that election in the city of New York, complaints to be sworn out against ninety-three hundred persons of foreign birth. On those complaints there were five thousand and four warrants issued for the arrest of men who were entitled to vote, and there were three hundred arrests actually made. What was the character of those arrests? I call the attention of Senators to the remarkable state of affairs that existed there on the day of that election. I read from the testimony of no ordinary man, I read the testimony of the chief superintendent of the store of A. T. Stewart & Co. He is no ordinary man. He is a man of mark, a man of large ability, a man of integrity, a man of great purity of character, or he would not have occupied the position that he did. On the day of the election that man, Mr. Denning, went to vote. Now, I ask Senators to listen and hear what took place:

Question. What is your business?
Answer. Dry goods.
Q. Where do you do business?
A. With A. T. Stewart & Co.
Q. You are superintendent of the uptown store of A. T. Stewart & Co.?
A. Yes, sir; superintendent of the retail store.
Q. How long have you been the superintendent of the store?
A. About ten years.
Q. How many men have you under your charge as superintendent of that store?
A. It ranges from five hundred to one thousand people.

Q. When did you come to America?
A. In 1860.
Q. How old were you at that time?
A. In the neighborhood of twenty or twenty-one years.
Q. When were you naturalized?
A. In November, 1868.
Q. Who was your witness?
A. Alfred M. Weeks.
Q. Where is he employed?
A. In our store.
Q. And he had been in the uptown store with you?
A. Yes, sir; all the time I was there.
Q. Before what judge were you naturalized in 1868?
A. I declared it my intention some three years previously.
Q. Were you naturalized in the regular way?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were you naturalized in 1868?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. After you were naturalized, did you vote?
A. Yes, sir; right straight along.
Q. Until 1878?
A. Yes, sir; until that time.

Ten years this man had been a voter.

Q. Tell the committee what happened when you went to register.

Such occurrences as the following took place there at the last election in 1878, and this is only one specimen of them; and I read this because it is the testimony of a man of mark—such a reign of terror scarcely ever prevailed over any city, certainly not upon this continent. He details what took place with him, and when it could take place with such a man what would be done with a poor day laborer?

Question. Tell the committee what happened when you went to register.
Answer. I registered in the same house that I always did, in Fourth avenue near Tenth; I had been registered there all along. I have lived at No. 84 East Ninth street between six and seven years. The last week of October, I think about the 25th, I went to this same place that I had always been registered and offered my name and address, &c., which was taken. As I was on the point of leaving the gentleman there said he would like to see my papers—

That was one of these supervisors, or some striker under him—and I gave them to him and waited for him to return them. He said he would not give them back. I told him at once, says I, "That is a little bit singular; won't you give me some receipt for it?" "No," says he, "I do not want to do anything whatever."

Q. On that occasion were you informed that your papers were illegal in any way?
A. No. I tried to find out as to that, but I did not get any positive information.
Q. What steps did you take after that to find out if there was anything the matter with the papers?
A. I referred the matter to the lawyer of the house of A. T. Stewart & Co., Mr. H. H. Rice. I requested him to get me a duplicate, telling him that if there was anything wrong about it I would like to know it; and I believe he wrote to Mr. O'Brien, the chief clerk of elections in the city of New York, in regard to it. Mr. Rice received an answer from him, stating that he had no doubt it would be all right, and at the same time I received the duplicate of my papers.
Q. On election day you went to vote?
A. I went to vote. I walked out of the store without any overcoat on, the polling-place being right next door. I went in and offered my vote. The gentleman there called to another person, who came up and told me that I was arrested.
Q. Did you have an opportunity to vote?
A. Oh, no. They would not let me vote. I had my ballot all ready, and presented it, but they would not allow it.
Q. Were you taken away?
A. Yes, sir; right off.
Q. Where?
A. First of all down to Clinton Place.
Q. From there where were you taken?
A. Down to the city hall.
Q. You mean the post-office building, do you not?
A. Yes, sir; the United States court-house and post-office building.
Q. Please state what took place when you came down here.
A. The place was all in confusion. There was an immense number of men around. There was no getting at anything or anybody. I was running around from one room to another, first one way and then another; upstairs to the third floor, down to the second floor, up to the fourth floor, and in three or four places.
Q. Mr. Rice was present?
A. Yes, sir; he was present, and offered to bail me.
Q. You were taken before Commissioner Davenport?
A. Yes. Finally I was taken to one of the gentlemen.
Q. Which of the commissioners?
A. I think it was Commissioner Deuel.
Q. What took place before him?
A. He wanted me to give bond for my appearance, which I rather demurred to.
Q. Did Commissioner Deuel say anything to you as to whether you had voted or not?
A. He asked me whether I had voted.
Q. Was there anything said as to whether you would or would not vote?
A. That was afterward. Commissioner Davenport allowed me to go—that I would not voteallowed me to go, with the understanding that I would not vote.

This is Commissioner Davenport—

Mr. Davenport is the man who had the warrant sworn out. He is the man before whom Mr. Denning was taken and who let him go if he would promise not to vote. Here was a man arrested who had a thousand men under him.

Question. Then you went before Commissioner Davenport?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. State what took place before him.
A. Commissioner Davenport was very courteous in his manner. I told him that I would like to be allowed to go to vote, and he said that I could not vote; that I would not be allowed to go if I did not promise not to vote, and sooner than stay there all day I said that I would not vote.
Q. Were you here in the back part of the court-room?
A. Yes, sir; I was hustled all around everywhere.
Q. By this time there was quite a little bit of a crowd in the court-room, wasn't there?
A. Yes, sir; I almost had my coat dragged off of me getting through the doors.
Q. You remarked that you had no overcoat on when you came out; was it a cold day?
A. Yes, sir; I expected to be gone from the store but a few moments, and therefore I did not take my overcoat.
Q. Of course you suffered?
A. Of course I did. The whole thing was the greatest outrage I ever saw perpetrated—

And so I believe the American people will say that it is the greatest outrage that ever was perpetrated, and they will demand in tones of thunder that a law which allows such a scene shall be repealed, and it is not revolutionary on our part to seek to repeal it—

I positively would not have believed it unless I had experienced it myself.
Q. Was it suggested to Commissioner Davenport that the business of your house was suffering from your absence?
A. I believe Mr. Rice remarked something in that way to him.
Q. You have stated that from 1868 to 1878 you have voted; did you perform jury duty?
A. I do not know that I did.
Q. What time was it that you were finally released?
A. It must have been on toward two o'clock.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you promise Mr. Davenport that you would not vote?
A. Yes, sir; that was the only way in which I was allowed to go.

Then Mr. Davenport cross-examined him.

By Mr. DAVENPORT:

Question. I understood you to say that you declared your intentions?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Three or four years before?
A. Several years before.
Q. Do you remember how long before?
A. I would not be positive about it; but I know it was within the prescribed time.
Q. Within two years?
A. Yes, sir; it was after two years; there is no question about that.
Q. Was it on the 7th of September, 1866?
A. I won't be sure about the time. I know I was very careful about the time, because I had the thing fully understood. I was in no hurry about the time.
Q. You say that you were not allowed to go unless you promised not to vote. Did the question of bail arise at all?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did I refuse to take any bail?
A. The bail matter I believe was an after consideration.
Q. I ask you did I refuse to take any bail?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. If you had given bail you could have gone and voted, could you not?
A. No.
Q. Why not?
A. Because you said not; you further said that if I went and voted I would be liable to be rearrested.

There is a man having a thousand men under him, and he was afraid to vote; he was thus intimidated. And as the testimony in the case shows, there were nine thousand complaints sworn to under the order of this man Davenport, five thousand and four warrants were issued, three hundred arrests made, and twelve hundred and seventy-nine United States deputy marshals were appointed for that day to enforce the law, and $55,680 paid to them. This is the proceeding of one day under this law; and yet we are told that we are revolutionists for attempting to repeal it and give these men the right to vote, give these men the right to sit on juries. To repeal the law which causes these infamous attacks upon the liberties of the American people is denounced as revolution. The American people want no paid spies, they want no paid informers. They want no spies to watch them when they are voting. This is a free country, or it ought to be free. They are not free if that law remains in force. Mr. Davenport says in his testimony—I give his own language—as to the operations of the Federal law:

Under the provisions of that act (section 2025, Revised Statutes) I was appointed chief supervisor of elections for the southern district of New York, and for seven years last past have been specially charged with the duty of enforcing these laws. At each congressional election I have warned persons holding the certificates of 1868 against registering or voting thereon—and at each election have caused the arrest of those who registered, so far as I could obtain specific evidence of the fraudulent character of their certificates. By the most persistent and continued attacks upon such papers, the arrest of hundreds of those who held them, the seizure of their papers—

Who gave him the power to warn men against voting? Who made him the dictator to the freemen of this country?—

Their naturalization papers, their title deeds to American citizenship were seized by this dictator, because the foreigner on the certified copy of his naturalization papers is entitled to American citizenship, and here this man says he arrested them for having copies and using them. It is under this law that he has the power to do it, a law that we are seeking to repeal. He furthermore says:

By the most persistent and continued attacks upon such papers, the arrest of hundreds of those who held them, the seizure of their papers, and other means, I have succeeded in reducing the number in circulation in this county from about forty thousand to ten thousand.

He has seized and taken from foreigners, Irishmen, Germans, Swiss, Danes, Englishmen, wherever they come from, their naturalization papers. He says in his testimony that there were forty thousand of these naturalization papers, these title deeds in the possession of these men to their American citizenship, and he has seized thirty thousand of them. There are but ten thousand left. He furthermore goes on and says that of that ten thousand only twelve hundred men voted at the last election because they were afraid they would be arrested as Mr. Denning was. He says further:

The United States has expended from sixty to one hundred thousand dollars at each congressional election in this city since 1870 in the effort to have fair and honest elections.

Yes, the General Government has spent from sixty to one hundred thousand dollars a year in the city of New York for the purpose of seizing from foreign-born citizens of the United States their title deeds to their American citizenship.

He further says:

At the presidential election in 1876 I made a special and persistent attack upon those who had registered thereon, and seized a large number of those certificates where I had evidence upon which I could successfully defend my action. In addition to this, I caused every person who held such a paper to be challenged, upon the express ground that he was possessed of a paper believed to have been fraudulently obtained.

How did he further intimidate them? He tells you that he put this kind of a notice up all over the city of New York. Here it is:

UNITED STATES COURT-HOUSE—

The court-house of the United States which we are asked to support and keep up—

UNITED STATES COURT-HOUSE, ROOM 1, FOURTH FLOOR,
New York, August 20, 1878.

SIR: As complaint has been filed with me charging you—

And he had the complaint filed—charging you with being possessed of a false, fraudulent, and void certificate of naturalization, issued in 1868, your attention is called to the following notice from the United States district attorney.

Respectfully yours,

warning all such men to give up their papers and not to vote, or they would be arrested. At the last election in the city of New York he says he had brought the number down to ten thousand, and he was asked how many of that ten thousand voted, and he answered twelve hundred and forty, and "they would not have voted if I could have prevented." There were only twelve hundred and forty out of the ten thousand that were naturalized in 1868 who had the temerity to vote in the face of all these threats, in the face of all these arrests.

The significance of all this lies here: it was supposed when the law creating these United States supervisors and deputy marshals was passed that they were for the purpose of bringing on fair elections down South. It was not desired for that; it has not been used there and will not be used there to as great and alarming extent as in New York City. Why? If a presidential election in the State of New York can be carried by one vote it gives thirty-five electoral votes to the candidate for President who receives them. The State I represent has only five electoral votes and is of no very great importance; but if they can carry the great State of New York by a popular majority of one it gives the thirty-five electoral votes of that State for one candidate for President. That is the reason for this great effort in the city and State of New York.

But, Mr. President, something may be asked in regard to the certificates of naturalization issued in 1868. What inducement was there for Mr. Davenport to make an attack upon the foreign-born citizens who were naturalized in 1868. He says they were fraudulent certificates. This very question as to these naturalization papers has been decided by nineteen judges in the State of New York, and Davenport knew it. I hold in my hand the opinion rendered in the test case.

This very point had been decided. Davenport said there was not sufficient record of the admission of these parties to the rights of citizenship, not that the men were not entitled to naturalization, not that they had not the right to vote, but that the clerk of the court had not made a proper record; it was too meager; it was too concise; and that question came up in the case of Peter Coleman vs. John I. Davenport and was decided by Judge Blatchford of the United States district court. I have his opinion in my hand. It is as follows:

The statute, in requiring the proceedings to which it refers to be "recorded by the clerk of the court," required no other record in respect of Coleman than that which was made, either as respects the order of admission or any of the oaths or affidavits. In in re Christian, before Judge Freedman, of the superior court of New York, October 15, 1878, persons in the exact position of Coleman applied to that court to have the record of the proceedings in that court admitting them to citizenship perfected by an entry nunc pro tunc of the fact of such admission in the minute-book of that court. The sole ground of such application was that the validity of the admission of the party to citizenship was disputed, on the allegation that there was no legal record of the judgment admitting him to citizenship, for the reason that the clerk of the court did not write out an entry in the minute-book of the court reciting the proceedings and showing the adjudication made. This is the same point now urged here. Judge Freedman, in his decision in that case, details the practice of the superior court from the close of 1858 to the close of 1873 in naturalization proceedings, and shows it to have been the same in all cases as in the case of Coleman. He held that what was so done constituted a sufficient record, and that the want of any further or different record, and the absence of an entry in the general minute-book of the court, did not render the admission to citizenship invalid. He therefore denied the application on the ground that no necessity existed for granting it, because there was no defect in the record which required perfection by amendment.

In another place the judge says:

That court for a period of fifteen years observed the same form of procedure, and kept the same records, and made the same orders of admission in all cases of naturalization as in the case of Coleman, and none other. During that period nineteen judges occupied seats on the bench of that court. They were Joseph S. Bosworth, Murray Hoffman, John Slosson, Lewis H. Woodruff, Edwards Pierrepont, James Monerief, Anthony L. Robertson, James W. White, John M. Barbour, Claudius L. Monell, Samuel B. Garvin, John H. McCunn, Samuel Jones, Freeman J. Fithian, John J. Freedman, James C. Spencer, William E. Curtis, John Sedgwick, and Hooper C. Van Vorst. It is to be presumed that, in each case of naturalization during that time, a certificate was given like in form to that received by Coleman, and averring that the court had ordered the admission of the party. That series of judges must have regarded what was found on the files or in the records or books of the court in each case as an order of admission or as a record showing that such an order had been made by the court.

The nineteen judges here named had agreed; all had passed on this very question; all said the issue of the papers was right and regular; that these men had a right to vote; and yet Davenport makes that the excuse for issuing the orders for the arrest of these men.

In the city of Philadelphia at the last election they had seven hundred and eighty-three deputy marshals appointed, all republicans, and they had twelve hundred republican police officers. Here were nearly two thousand men, all republicans, all officers either of the National or local Government and all paid either by the National Government or the city or the State government, all of them carrying the authority of the National Government on the left breast and in the right hand carrying republican tickets. It is such a law as this that we are seeking to repeal.

Again, the democratic party and all lovers of liberty say they do not want the Army at the polls except for the purpose of repelling an invasion of the enemies of the Government. What does Mr. Seward say upon the subject of the right and the power of keeping a standing army for the purpose of civil police? You will find on August 7, 1856, Mr. Seward in the Senate used this language; and I commend it to all lovers of liberty:

Civil liberty and a standing army for the purposes of civil police have never yet stood together, and never can stand together. If I am to choose, sir, between upholding laws in any part of this Republic, which cannot be maintained without a standing army, or relinquishing the laws themselves, I give up the laws at once, by whomsoever they are made, and by whatever authority; for, either our system of government is radically wrong or such laws are unjust, unequal, and pernicious.

I commend the language of that great statesman to my friends on the other side of the House. He goes on further to say:

If the founders of the Constitution had been told that within seventy years from the day on which they laid its solid foundations and raised its majestic columns a standing army would have been found necessary and indispensable merely to execute municipal laws, they would have turned shuddering away from the massive despotism which they had erected.

A standing army for the purpose of civil police and civil liberty, Mr. Seward says, can never stand together, and if the Army was to be used to enforce such laws and he was compelled to give up either the laws or the Army, he would give up the laws. That is what we ask you to do to-day, to give up the law, for there is no necessity for it, there is no necessity for eleven thousand deputy marshals at one election to carry out any law of this country that ought to exist. All we ask is that the people shall have the right to govern themselves.

Furthermore, what does your present Secretary of State say on this very subject? He was Attorney-General under President Johnson, and in a letter written August 20, 1868, to a marshal of the United States, he says:

The special duty and authority in the execution of process—

That is, not in making arrests without process, such arrests as Davenport ordered, such arrests as these deputy marshals made—

The special duty and authority in the execution of process issued to you must not be confounded with the duty and authority of suppressing disorder and preserving the peace, which, under our Government, belongs to the civil authorities of the States, and not to the civil authorities of the United States.

This power belongs to the civil authorities of the States, your Secretary of State says, and not to the civil authorities of the United States. Ah, but we are told that the President will veto this bill, that we are seeking to tie up the hands of the President. Who has the right to say upon this floor or in the other Hall what the President will do? I believe that the President will sign both these bills, that we are not running counter to the wishes of the President; but whether we are or not makes no difference with me, and it ought to make no difference with any free American citizen. I take it that the President will sign these bills, that we are not running counter to his wish, and no party has a right to stand on this floor and say that the present incumbent of the White House will veto this or that or the other bill. I suppose the way my friend from Massachusetts fell into this error might have been this: that in his reading English history, with which he has shown very great familiarity, he thought, perhaps, in reading some of the forms of their laws that when we drew up a statute it must be something in the language of an English statute. When they come to present a bill to enact a law it is like this—I read from one statute of Great Britain and Ireland—I take one as a sample, they are all alike; this is one that was introduced for the naturalization of His Serene Highness Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha just before he was married to Queen Victoria, on the 7th of February, 1840. This, I suppose, hereafter, if the theory of the Senator is to be carried out, and we are to consult the President, is the way our laws must read:

Whereas it hath pleased Her Majesty most graciously to declare her intention to ally herself by marriage with the Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha; and whereas a more grateful proof of the esteem and affection of the kingdom cannot be given to his Serene Highness than by an act of naturalization to make him capable of enjoying the rights and liberties which are enjoyed in this realm: We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, do most humbly beseech your Majesty that it may be enacted; and be it enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled.

I suppose that we are to consult the views of the President, and we must ask his permission to pass a law in advance. In the language of this law we must say, "we do most humbly beseech your majesty that it may be enacted by the queen's most excellent majesty." I do not believe that the day will ever come when such a spirit as that will pervade this country, but that is the spirit running through the elaborate speech of my honorable friend from Massachusetts. I do not desire to treat him with unkindness; I could not do it. We have been for many years either in one branch or the other of the American Congress. We have sat on committees together, and as far as we are personally concerned, my relations with him are of the very kindest; but I could not let this remarkable speech of his, preceded by his remarkable resolution, pass without drawing attention to it.

Mr. President, must not the voice of the people be heard, have they not a right to be heard? To-day one great prominent party has control of both branches of this Government. To-day twenty-three out of thirty-eight governors of the several States represent the same great political party. The people have spoken in every way that they can speak to place that party in power which has fought against the enactment of such laws as this, and they are in favor of the repeal of them. Twenty-three of the thirty-eight States have democratic governors to-day. The same sentiment pervades both Halls of the American Congress. Shall not that voice of the great American people be heard? What right has any man, then, to say that the President will by his veto check and stifle the voice of the people thus spoken in every manner? Who ever heard of the President vetoing a bill for the repeal of a law? Many of these laws were placed upon our statute-book by being tacked upon appropriation bills, and we seek to get rid of them in the same manner. No English sovereign has dared since 1692 to veto a bill of the British Parliament.

Mr. President, I have nearly done. I have thus feebly tried to raise my voice in favor of free elections, uncontrolled by a standing army, the terror through all ages of free government; uncontrolled by your supervisors of elections, those paid informers and spies upon a free people; uninfluenced by your thousands of unscrupulous, irresponsible deputy marshals, wearing on their left breast the badge of a United States officer and holding in their right hands the ticket—the ballot of a political party—a political engine of power a thousand times more to be dreaded than the Army; in favor of a free and fair jury all over the land, the "favorite child of the English law," the "origin of which is lost in the night of time," of which it has been said that "it is of a tradition so high that nothing is known of its origin, and of a perfection so absolute that it has remained in unabated vigor from its commencement to the present time." By one of the ancient kings of Wales it was called the "apostolic law." By the elder Pitt it was called the "buttress of liberty." The great Erskine, the especial champion of personal liberty, had engraved on the scroll of his coat of arms, "Trial by jury."

But what is trial by jury? The law-books tell us, and the language is familiar and the thought cherished by every lawyer, that it is a trial "by the country." But all this "trial by the country" would be no trial at all by the country, but only a trial by the Government, if the Government could declare who may or who may not be jurors.

A certain law-writer says:

> If the Government can say who may or who may not be jurors, it will, of course, select only its partisans and those friendly to its measures. It may not only prescribe who may and who may not be eligible to be drawn as jurors, but it may also question each person drawn as a juror as to his sentiments.

And that is just what is permitted by the law as it now stands and which is by us sought to be repealed. And yet we are told we are engaged in a revolution; and under this law this enormous, far-reaching power is placed in the hands of one man.

Mr. President, it was for this "right of trial by jury" that our revolutionary fathers fought and died; it was for this inestimable right that Washington drew his sword; it was to maintain and preserve this, among other rights, that those noble men crimsoned the snow at Valley Forge with their life's blood. Shall we without a struggle surrender it? Never! No, never!

The struggle for the independence of the jury trial was gloriously illustrated in England in the trial and acquittal of the seven bishops in 1688. It was in that memorable struggle that it was shown that the popular voice (as I believe is the case now and in this country) was not yet so completely awed or silenced as to be insensible to attacks on liberty and right. Our English brethren resisted the assumption of the Crown and triumphed; shall we, the citizens of a free republic, do less? If we did we would be unworthy descendants of noble sires. Mr. President, under this law authorizing the appointment of deputy marshals there is no limit. If you can appoint eleven thousand, as I have shown was done in one instance, you can appoint one hundred thousand or a million—where is the limit? In the hands of irresponsible parties, who dare say it will not be exercised at the next presidential election? Then farewell to free elections; it will be a farce, more completely so than when Napoleon III in 1851, at the dead hour of the night, in an hour by previous arrangement when all Paris was wrapped in the arms of sleep, had every prominent place in the gay capital plastered over with three proclamations: first, a decree announcing the dissolution of their National Assembly; secondly, that the council of state was dismissed; and third, that universal suffrage was established.

By another proclamation the people of France were invited to vote upon the question of electing "a responsible chief for ten years," the voting to take place between the 14th and 21st of December; the day of election came, and the voters marched to the polls between double rows of fixed bayonets and cast their votes. Napoleon was successful—he was elected for ten years. The coup d'état was complete. He who had failed at Strasbourg and Boulogne had triumphed at Paris. All this was done in the name of liberty and universal suffrage, and not as many arrests made as were made in New York City by Johnny Davenport. But the people were intimidated and overawed by the exhibition of the power of the State.

We seek, Mr. President, by the repeal of these laws, the jury law, the supervisors and marshals laws, and by prohibiting bayonets at the polls, to avert such a terrible calamity as I have thus depicted; and for this attempt in a quiet, legal, and constitutional manner we are charged on this floor with attempting a revolution. It may be a revolution, but it is a counter revolution. We seek to get back to the ancient landmarks of our fathers and there to remain forever.

Mr. President, I believe these sentiments and this attempt will find a response and an echo in every part of this land—from the snow-clad mountains of Alaska to the oppressed land where the air is perfumed by the magnolia; from the pine-clad forests of Maine to the workshops of Massachusetts; in the great metropolitan city of New York, the mines of Pennsylvania, the valleys of the giant West, and upon mountain heights; from all sorts of people, the native American, the sons of Erin, the admirers of Emmet, the Germans, the Swiss, the Dane, and the Mennonite driven from his home by the edicts of the Czar of Russia. I know it will find a universal response in my own mountain home, where, in the language of one of her most gifted sons, her citizens are lulled to sleep at night by the roar of the cataracts and awakened in the morning by the scream of the eagle as he takes his flight sunward.

Repeal these obnoxious laws, Mr. President, and all will be well; all will be peace and harmony. Allow the people a free and fair election, a fair jury, and self-government, and peace and prosperity will reign throughout our borders; retain them, and I fear the worst. Repeal them and again reassert the doctrine of our fathers, that man, proud man, with brow erect and lofty intellect, is capable of self-government without the interference of the Army and paid spies and informers, and this Government of ours, the best upon which the sun ever rose or set, will remain in its pristine beauty, glory, and power until "the latest syllable of recorded time."

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WITHERS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EATON in the chair.) The regular order is called for, which is the Army appropriation bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. WITHERS. I shall preface the consideration of this bill by some general statements with regard to it. The bill is almost identical in its provisions with the bill which passed the Senate at the last session. It is suggested that before proceeding further the bill had best be reported in extenso from the Secretary's table. I accept the suggestion and ask that it may be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be reported at length. The Chair omitted to direct the reading of it.

Mr. WITHERS. If it meets with the general concurrence of the Senate, I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it may be read and considered by sections, and acted upon at least until we get to the sixth section of the bill, which will probably be the section upon which general debate will be had. By that means we can dispose of all the antecedent portion of the bill and save time, I think, in disposing of the measure, if there be no objection to that course on the part of any Senator.

Mr. CONKLING. Down to what line or point is the bill as it was at the last session?

Mr. WITHERS. The differences are very slight. The bill may be read down to the sixth section if the proposition I make meets with the assent of the Senate. I can, as each section is reached, point out any difference which exists between the section as read and the previous bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest to the Senator he probably means paragraphs and not sections. Section 1 goes to midway of page 12.

Mr. WITHERS. I refer to the paragraphs of the bill, of course.

Mr. CONKLING. Are the bills the same down to section 2?

Mr. WITHERS. Almost; the differences are very slight. In some cases there has been a slight increase in the appropriation.

Mr. CONKLING. Why does not the Senator, having the bill in his hand, begin at the beginning and point out to us, as probably he can in a moment, the alterations?

Mr. WITHERS. Very good; that was my first view of the matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill is quite short; I should rather prefer to have it read so that we can all read it over once as the Clerk reads it, and then the Senator can explain. It is very short, and it will only take a very little time to read it.

Mr. WITHERS. Certainly, if the Senator so desires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. WITHERS. Now, I ask that we proceed to consider the bill by paragraphs, premising, however, by the statement that the Committee on Appropriations have no amendments to offer. Of course, as the bill is in Committee of the Whole, it is open to amendment, and any Senator who desires has the privilege of offering an amendment.

I will state in general terms that this bill resembles in all its principal features the bill which was reported to and passed by the Senate last session, with the exceptions which I shall notice. The amount of the bill as passed by the House was $26,797,300. The amount of the bill as reported to the Senate is $26,797,300. The total of the estimates from the Department for 1880 was $28,384,500. The bill as reported is less than the estimates by the sum of $1,587,200. As compared with the appropriations of last year, the appropriations for 1879 being $26,593,486.01, the bill as reported exceeds the appropriations for 1879 by the sum of $203,813.99.

The items of increase and reduction in this bill as compared with the appropriation bill for 1879 are as follows:

For the pay of the Army there is an increase of $699,112.82;

For subsistence there is a reduction of $15,000;

For quartermaster supplies there is an increase of $250,000;

For ordnance supplies there is an increase of $10,000;

For repairing ordnance, dismounting guns, &c., there is an increase of $5,000;

For military post near the Niobrara River there is an appropriation of $50,000;

For military post in Montana there is a decrease of $100,000;

For military post in Dakota there is a decrease of $100,000;

For completing the Medical and Surgical History of the War there is a reduction of $12,883.85;

For illustrations for the same there is a reduction of $17,414.98;

For improving ground at Sandy Hook there is a reduction of $5,000;

For the site of a powder depot there is an increase of $50,000;

For the manufacture of arms at the national armories there is an increase of $100,000;

For the Army and Indian transfer commission there is a decrease of $10,000;

Making a total of increase in this bill as compared with the bill of 1879 of $1,164,112.82, with a reduction of $260,298.83 as compared with the same bill, being an increase of $903,813.99. There was, however, a deficiency bill passed last year (rendered necessary by the deficiency of appropriations) of $700,000, which, deducted from the increase under this bill, leaves a net increase of $203,813.99 as compared with the appropriations for 1879.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator pleases, will he not repeat what he stated about the manufacture of arms?

Mr. WITHERS. For the manufacture of arms at the national armories there is an increase by this bill of $100,000 over the bill of last year.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator give me the page and line of the bill?

For manufacture of arms at national armories, $250,000.

For this item the bill of last year appropriated $150,000. The estimates were $800,000. This bill appropriates $250,000.

There are of course several subjects of legislation in this bill, all of which were agreed to, however, in the bill which passed at the last session with the exception of the sixth section, which is now incorporated in the bill, and which was not then agreed to. There are only two or three provisions of any importance which were contained in the bill of last session which are not included in the present bill. The first omitted provision will be found on page 5 of the bill of last session, under the title of "Pay, and so forth, of the Army, 1880." The former bill has this provision:

And in case any item of the said appropriations shall prove insufficient for its purposes, the excess in any other item or items thereof may, with the written consent of the Secretary of War, be applied thereto: Provided, however, That the total amount appropriated under this head shall not be exceeded.

That is omitted from the present bill. It was stricken out by the House. A similar item is to be found in the appropriations made for the Quartermaster's Department, where a similar provision was incorporated in the bill of last session, as follows:

And in case any item of the said appropriations for "regular supplies," "incidental expenses," "barracks and quarters," and "Army transportation," shall prove insufficient for its purpose, the excess in any other of these items may, with the written consent of the Secretary of War, be applied thereto: Provided, however, That the total amount appropriated under these heads shall not be exceeded.

This provision involved the same principle of permitting the Secretary of War to use an excess of appropriation for one object where there is a deficiency in another branch of the same service. Another provision left out of the present bill is to be found on page 3 of the bill of last session, as follows:

That officers of the Army on the frontier for travel, on duty, under orders, and not by railroad, may, at their option, receive mileage according to existing law and regulations, or the actual necessary expenses of such travel, according to such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe: Provided, That so much of the act of July 24, 1876, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877," as prohibits payment of mileage for travel over any railroad on which the troops and supplies of the United States are entitled to be transported free of charge be, and is hereby, repealed.

That provision is not in the bill as at present reported.

I believe I have now called attention to all the material differences between the bill which is now before the Senate and the bill of last session. There are several changes in amounts appropriated which are none of them of much moment, and which I can explain at any time to the satisfaction of any Senator who may desire to know the why and wherefore. Having mentioned these I have mentioned all that occur to me as being worthy of consideration before we proceed with the bill to act upon it by paragraphs; but if any other member of the committee recalls any feature of the bill which has not been alluded to that differs from the bill of last session, I will be very glad if he will mention it.

With this statement, therefore, I ask that the bill be considered by paragraphs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the course suggested by the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears no objection. The Secretary will read the first paragraph of the bill.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1880, as follows:

For expenses of the Commanding General's office, $2,500.

Mr. WITHERS. I suggest that if objection be not made, each paragraph shall be considered as adopted in Committee of the Whole after being read, unless objection is made, without any necessity of a formal vote in every case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Chair will consider that each paragraph is adopted as read, unless some Senator rises.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill to lines 266 and 267 of section 1; which were read, as follows:

For manufacture of arms at national armories, $250,000.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move to amend that paragraph by striking out "$250,000" and inserting "$150,000," which was the amount agreed upon in the bill of last session, and I see no reason for increasing it.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. BURNSIDE. No, I think not. I think the committee have increased the amount $100,000, and I see no reason for increasing it. In fact, as an abstract question I am opposed to the appropriation of any sum for the manufacture of arms at present. In the bill agreed upon at the last session the amount of this item was $150,000, unless I am very much mistaken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE.]

Mr. WITHERS. With regard to the proposition to amend by reducing the sum to the extent of $100,000, I will state the reasons which influenced the committee in proposing the increase, which were briefly these: a very strong appeal was made to us by the War Department on the subject of an increase of this appropriation. The Department, indeed, estimated for an appropriation of $800,000. You will find the estimate on the one hundred and third page of the estimates sent in by the War Department March 19:

Manufacture of arms at the national armories; and should a board of ordnance officers recommend a suitable magazine-gun for the military service, the Secretary of War is authorized to expend not more than $25,000 of this amount in its manufacture	$900,000
Reduction by the Secretary of War	100,000

By the bill of last year, for 1879, the actual appropriation made for this same service was $150,000, and the amount of $250,000 in the present bill was reported in the bill which was passed by the Senate at the last session for the ensuing fiscal year; but it failed to pass by the general failure of the bill. The following note is added to the estimate:

NOTE.—During the ten years preceding the war of the rebellion, from 1852 to 1861, there was appropriated annually, on an average, $251,000 for the manufacture of arms at the national armories, and with this sum the wants of a smaller army and of a smaller population permitted the gradual increase of them in store. The increased cost of the present breech-loading rifle, the greater demand for its use, and the paucity of the appropriations of late years, have left the country in a dangerous condition; there being on hand July 31, 1878, subject to issue but nineteen thousand rifles and carbines. It is of the most vital importance to the nation that the manufacture of arms by this Department be steadily continued in quantities sufficient to render a gradual accumulation of them in store a certainty. The number of small-arms on hand should never be less than five hundred thousand.

In the same connection I will remark that I presume Senators representing almost every State on this floor have personal knowledge of the fact that demands have come up from their constituents for an increase of arms, which cannot be granted because there is no accumulation of arms in the armories sufficient to supply such demands. The reason of the increased appropriation was to enable the Government to manufacture arms a little in addition to the surplus necessary to meet the wear and tear of arms in use, so that a gradual accumulation of arms in the armories might be maintained, which would enable us to supply the demand for such arms from the States as their necessities may require.

These are, in brief, the reasons which influenced the committee in making the increased appropriation.

Mr. BURNSIDE. My motive in moving to amend was to adhere to what was agreed upon at the last session of Congress.

Mr. WITHERS. This is the amount agreed upon at the last session.

Mr. BURNSIDE. In the bill passed by the Senate at the last session?

Mr. DAWES. This is the same sum that was appropriated in the bill last session.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I beg pardon; I withdraw my motion to amend if that is the case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I beg to state, in justification of what I said, that I am upon principle opposed to the appropriation of any amount for the manufacture of arms at present until an arm is settled upon which will be understood to be the best military arm in existence. I am opposed to the manufacture of any more arms of any pattern, for the present at any rate. We have now enough arms lying in the armories, and there is no wisdom in my opinion in continuing the manufacture of arms of this pattern at this time. I do not say this with a view to create any result now, because if this amount was agreed upon in the last bill I make no objection to it here.

Mr. WITHERS. It is the amount appropriated by the bill of last session.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask a question. I have no opposition to present to this item; but I did not understand the Senator from Virginia. I desire to ask him what is the number of arms now on hand commonly denominated small-arms—rifles and muskets?

Mr. WITHERS. Nineteen thousand rifles and carbines comprise the whole number of small-arms now on hand.

Mr. LOGAN. Do I understand that the Secretary of War reports that there are but nineteen thousand rifles and carbines on hand?

Mr. WITHERS. That is the report of the Secretary of War.

Mr. LOGAN. That cannot possibly be correct.

Mr. WITHERS. Of course the committee are not prepared to challenge the correctness of the statement, but accept it on the authority of the Secretary of War.

Mr. LOGAN. When I say it cannot possibly be correct, I mean that there must be some error in the print, or something of that kind, because the statement cannot be correct that there are only nineteen thousand of these arms on hand. I wish also to ask if the arms now manufactured are of the Allyn pattern. Of what pattern are the recent arms that are being manufactured?

Mr. WITHERS. I am not prepared to inform the Senator what special pattern or patterns are being manufactured. The committee have acted simply upon the estimates submitted to them by the Secretary of War and the reasons adduced therefor. They did not think it incumbent upon them to enter into an investigation and decide what was the best possible pattern of rifle or musket or carbine which might be manufactured, but simply to provide for the manufacture of such as were at present made by the Government, assuming that the War Department had, in their opinion, selected that arm which was most serviceable.

Mr. LOGAN. I asked the question only for information. I have not been informed myself and I have no mode of ascertaining whether the arm has been changed recently or not. That which is used by the Army I know is a very fine arm. I suppose the statement must mean that these are the surplus arms on hand, the arms ready to be distributed.

Mr. WITHERS. Certainly; that is precisely what it does mean.

Mr. LOGAN. That is what I wanted to understand, if it meant that or meant all the arms at the command of the Government.

Mr. WITHERS. It does not include those in the hands of the Army. It is not designed to apply to those in use by the troops in the field, but to the surplus for distribution.

Mr. LOGAN. I thought it very strange if they had only nineteen thousand on hand. I knew that could not be the entire number.

Mr. WITHERS. Oh, no; it is the surplus of arms.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no question before the Senate.

Mr. WITHERS. There is no question before the Senate. Let the reading of the bill proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn, and the Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill to section 2, which was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to cause all the regulations of the Army and general orders now in force to be codified and published to the Army, and to defray the expenses thereof out of the contingent fund of the Army.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to know what the committee intend by this section for publishing the Army regulations and general orders? Is it intended that this section shall make them the law for the Army?

Mr. WITHERS. It is designed to give authority to the Secretary to cause all the regulations of the Army and the general orders in force, which constitute the law of the Army, to be published for the information of the officers and soldiers of the Army.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not intended that the regulations which have been before Congress shall be published as the law for the Army?

Mr. WITHERS. It proposes no legislation in that direction whatever, but is simply an authority to publish for the use of the Army the Army regulations and the general orders now recognized as in force.

Mr. LOGAN. They have the authority anyhow. Of course they can publish those.

Mr. WITHERS. The action of the committee was simply to make provision for the payment of the expense necessary for that publication.

The Chief Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill and read section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. And the examiner of State claims in the office of the Secretary of War shall have, while on such duty, the pay, emoluments, and allowances of mounted officers one grade higher than that held by him in his regiment or corps.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the word "and" should be stricken out, and the word "that" inserted. I make that motion. There is nothing preceding the word "and," and I move to strike it out and insert "that," so that the section will appear to be what it is—an independent section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Iowa; to strike out the word "and," and insert "that" as the first word of the section.

Mr. WITHERS. The euphony of the bill would certainly be promoted by the adoption of the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa; and I will also state in general terms that there are several provisions in the bill which did not exactly meet the views of many members of the committee; but inasmuch as time was deemed an element of great importance in the passage of the appropriation bills, a majority of the committee consented to waive their objections to the phraseology of certain portions of the bill in order to avoid the necessity of returning the bill to the other House for their concurrence in amendments, so that when it passed the Senate, if we shall be able to pass it without amendment, it may be submitted to the President at once without further loss of time. For that reason several suggested amendments were resisted in the committee, and will be resisted here so far as we are able to do it. This proposed change of the word "and" to "that" is one of those.

Mr. ALLISON. This particular provision was in the last Army bill, and it was probably taken out of the center of a section, and it seems in redrafting this bill it has been printed just as before. There is nothing preceding, and the word "that" should be employed. Of course if it has been decreed by the majority that there shall be no amendment here, we must submit; but it seems to me that in the orderly course of proceeding we should insert the word "that" instead of the word "and."

Mr. WITHERS. I can only say that it was decreed by the majority of the Committee on Appropriations, or by the Committee on Appropriations, I should rather say, because the action of the majority constitutes the action of the committee, that the word "that" should not be substituted for the word "and."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

The amendment was rejected, there being on a division—ayes 20, noes 24.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to strike out the whole section. I think it has no place in an appropriation bill at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves to strike out the third section of the bill.

Mr. WITHERS. I will simply state that it is identical with a section to which the Senate gave its assent at the last session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And probably that is the reason the House of Representatives would not agree to it.

Mr. WITHERS. They did agree to it.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia what the object of this section is? I read:

And the examiner of State claims in the office of the Secretary of War shall have, while on such duty, the pay, emoluments, and allowances of mounted officers one grade higher than that held by him in his regiment or corps.

Mr. WITHERS. I should suppose that a Senator with the enlarged experience of the Senator from Illinois would know exactly what it means, inasmuch as it seems to me to be stated with great precision. There is in the office of the Secretary of War an officer whose duty it is to examine State claims, and this is a provision to give him while engaged in such work the pay, emoluments, and allowances of a mounted officer one grade higher than that held by him in his regiment or corps.

Mr. LOGAN. What grade does he hold?

Mr. WITHERS. It makes no difference what grade he holds. Whatever his grade may be, this provision is to allow him the pay of a grade higher.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course I do not desire to throw any obstacle in the way of the passage of the appropriation bill, but I do object to this section. It advances the pay of an officer of the Army while he temporarily holds a certain position. He is not nominated to any higher position than he holds. There is a law on the statute-book which prevents an officer of the Army from receiving pay for any duty which he performs higher than that of the rank which he holds in the Army. A captain, for instance, is detailed at the War Department. If he is a captain the next rank is that of major, and under this section he is not only to receive the rank of a major in the Army, but he is to receive the pay of a major of cavalry. If an infantry captain is detailed to this duty he then at once receives the pay of a cavalry major—not that of a cavalry captain, but of a cavalry major. I should like to hear some member of this committee explain to me why his rank and pay should be increased.

Mr. WITHERS. The reasons in brief are embodied in a communication from the Secretary of War and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, which I hold in my hand, and which I will read if the Senator desires.

Mr. LOGAN. I only ask for the reason operating on the mind of the committee. I am not asking the reasons which have been written by that officer perhaps who asked the Secretary or somebody to sign his paper and send it to the committee. I ask for the reason the committee had for increasing in an appropriation bill the rank of any officer of the Army to that of major of cavalry if he is a captain, with the rank and pay of a major of cavalry when he may only hold the office of captain of infantry?

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator is perfectly aware that if this section should pass it would not increase the rank of the officer one particle.

Mr. LOGAN. I insist that it would.

Mr. WITHERS. There is a difference of opinion between us.

Mr. LOGAN. I insist that it would for the reason that under the law no officer of the Army can receive pay for a rank other than that which he holds and which the law allows for that rank. You propose by virtue of this section of the bill to provide that this one officer shall receive the pay of the rank one grade higher than that which he holds and that the pay shall correspond with the rank one grade higher of cavalry. Hence by virtue of this act, although you do not give him the commission, you temporarily give him the rank by virtue of which he draws pay from the Government.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator seems to confound money and rank, which are two distinct things.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not at all.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator will admit that if Congress thinks proper to pass the section which is now under consideration it will be the law, and any pay or emolument received by the officer under the provisions of this section will be under the provisions of law.

Mr. LOGAN. I disagree with the Senator in respect——

Mr. WITHERS. I am unfortunate.

Mr. LOGAN. I will try to make myself understood. By the laws regulating the Army, if an officer is detailed to the staff of the General or of the Lieutenant-General, by virtue of that detail he receives a higher rank, although not a commission for it. He is assigned to duty with the rank of colonel, we will say, when his rank is probably that of captain; and by the law he receives the pay and emoluments of the rank of colonel. Hence it is understood in the Army that while he is on the staff of the General he has that rank and he is recognized by that rank. This is precisely a similar case. You detail an officer of the Army at the War Department not on the staff of the General, and by virtue of that detail you assign him to duty with a rank one grade higher than that which he has in the Army and he receives his pay therefor. That is exactly the position. It stands in the light of a person detailed on the staff of an officer where he has an assimilated rank of a higher grade.

Mr. WITHERS. Assimilated rank, I admit, but not actual rank.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not say that it gives him actual rank; I said it did not give him a commission; but by virtue of this provision it is the same thing; he has the assimilated rank. Why do you give it? You give it to an officer who is detailed to a nice, soft, easy place in Washington City, much less arduous than on "the tented field" or on the frontier; much less arduous than in the camp or at the post or wherever military duty may be performed by an officer of the Army. It has been sometimes, and too often, the case in the Congress of the United States that soft places have been given to particular persons by special act, and their rank, their assimilated rank, raised, so that they might receive more money and have a more pleasant time. I am utterly opposed to any such thing. We find many instances in the Army where by special legislation Congress has taken a man from the side of those occupying the same rank which he does, and placed him higher in the scale than his associates, higher in rank, in assimilated rank, if you use that term, higher by the pay he gets, and a much softer and easier place too is afforded to him, for the purpose of satisfying some particular friend or some particular relative or some select person belonging to some particular family.

That is all that this provision means in this bill. I for one am utterly opposed to any such thing. If a gentleman has the rank of a captain in the Army, let him get his promotion as others are promoted. Let him get it under the law as others get theirs, by virtue of resignation, death, or otherwise, as the term is used in relation to this Chamber, lawfully, not by special legislation for his especial benefit.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, it may be possible that the Secretary of War was influenced by considerations such as have been alluded to by the Senator from Illinois, but such was not the opinion of the Committee on Appropriations. They presumed that the reasons which are embodied in his letter, which I will have read to the Senate, were sufficient in his opinion to justify the increase of pay and emolument which was asked. I send the communication of the Secretary of War to the Clerk's desk and I ask that it be reported to the Senate as furnishing the reasons which influenced the Committee on Appropriations in reporting this section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The communication will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, January 27, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to recommend that the bill to supply deficiencies in appropriations may be made to enact a clause as follows:

That out of any money appropriated for the support of the Army there shall be allowed and paid to the examiner of State claims in the office of the Secretary of War the pay and allowances of a major of cavalry for the time the Secretary may certify the officer has been on duty in the office as examiner for the War Department of accounts and claims against the United States, deducting whatever pay and allowances said officer has received during that time.

The measure recommended is in the interest of economy, is based on principles of justice, and is deemed to be for the good of the public service at this time.

The inclosed copy of a letter from the late Second Comptroller of the Treasury (Hon. C. C. Carpenter) states that it is "in the interest of economy to pay," &c., the said examiner, and a letter from the former Second Comptroller, (Hon. J. M. Brodhead,) copy of letter herewith, shows the high character of the services rendered by the aforesaid officer, a fact of which I have personal knowledge myself.

The Supreme Court laid down a rule which I think is applicable to such a case, (where a jury must decide the question of compensation,) the rule being:

"That an equitable allowance shall be made in the same manner for extra services performed by an officer which did not come within the line of his official duty and which had been performed under the sanction of the Government or under circumstances of peculiar emergency. In such a case the compensation should be graduated by the amount paid for like services under similar circumstances. Usage may safely be relied on in such cases as fixing a just compensation."—The United States vs. E. W. Ripley, 7 Peters, 26.

I do not know of any military officer below the grade of major who has performed and continues to perform more arduous, trustful, and efficient administrative services than those rendered and being rendered by this officer, whose reports are made directly to me; nor do I know of one who can satisfactorily and fully discharge all the official duties now necessarily intrusted to this officer. These duties are of a varied and technical kind, and are only to be satisfactorily performed by an officer of experience in a given line, possessing a knowledge of precedents in matters of law and fact, as well as a knowledge of military affairs.

It is deemed necessary for the good of the public service at this time to retain on the side of the Government, with a life tenure of office, the best counsel that can be found to justly deal with the claims and claimants on account of the late war. I do not think such counsel can readily be obtained for the compensation paid to this officer, and I observe that the pay of the examiner of claims for the Department of State is fixed by statute at $4,000 per year, (section 349 Revised Statutes,) which is equal to about twice the pay and allowances of the examiner of State war claims in this office.

If the tenor of legislation was not opposed to any increase of the number of staff officers already allowed by law, I would recommend further the enactment of a clause to say: That any commissioned military officer once a major and assistant adjutant-general of volunteers, who has been or shall be for fifteen years on duty in the office of the Secretary of War, without change of station during that time, shall be entitled to the rank, pay, and allowances of major and assistant adjutant-general in the Army.

And in this connection I find a case where provision was made for an officer according to his increased services in 17 Statutes, 535, which states:

"And the officer in charge of the public buildings and grounds shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel."

I may add for your information that the examiner to whom this measure refers receives the pay and allowances of a lieutenant of infantry.

Among his various duties, including the supervision of estimates, requisitions, and the like, during the last two months he has made the original reports for my information and decision as between this Department and the Treasury on three claims, amounting to $359,843.72, the reports covering one hundred and seven pages of manuscript and showing an approval for allowance of $116,695.92; for suspension, $171,660.83; for disallowance, $71,486.97. And these reports are so well prepared that they are duly regarded by Treasury officials.

Respectfully, &c.,

GEO. W. McCRARY,
Secretary of War.

Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
SECOND COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE, January 29, 1877.

DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to a bill (Senate file 1160) the design of which is to make the compensation of Major Bradley, since his succession to the duties formerly performed by the late General Ketchum, more nearly proportional to the exacting and responsible services of his position in the War Office.

From the nature of my official duties the work performed by Major Bradley is brought daily to my observation, and I can therefore certify from personal knowledge, to the industry, the accuracy, and the familiarity with legal principles which are indispensable to the proper performance of his duties. I understand the duties which he now performs were formerly in charge of General Ketchum, who ranked and was paid as a colonel. In view of these facts, and the further fact that I believe it to be in the interest of economy, as it is unquestionably in the interest of justice, to pay an earnest, conscientious, and diligent official a salary bearing some proportion to his ability and his services, this measure seems to me entirely meritorious and well deserved. I shall be personally gratified if Congress give this bill consideration, as I am sure a knowledge of the facts will commend to just men the propriety of the proposed relief.

With great respect, very truly, yours,

C. C. CARPENTER.

Hon. J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 1, 1877.

DEAR SIR: While I was Second Comptroller of the Treasury, your work as successor of General Ketchum in the investigation of State claims, &c., came frequently before me. Your assiduity and thoroughness in the discharge of this duty was the subject of comment, and the only censure I heard expressed was that your scrutiny was too severe.

The intelligence and care with which your reports were prepared rendered them of great assistance in the adjustment of those claims, and the pay indicated in the bills for your relief, now before Congress, has been fairly earned, and would certainly be no more than an adequate compensation for the service you rendered to the public interest.

Very respectfully and truly, yours,

J. M. BRODHEAD.

Major THOMAS H. BRADLEY,
War Department.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire merely to call the attention of the Senator who has charge of this bill to the language of that document. I have nothing to say about how that paper was prepared, but it certainly was prepared with a great deal of care and pains. I do not doubt that the officer who prepared it is well qualified to decide on claims. If you notice the language used there, it is that he shall be entitled to "the rank, pay, and emoluments," I think. Read it over again and let us see.

Mr. WITHERS. There is no "rank" about it, but "pay, emoluments, and allowances."

Mr. LOGAN. I am talking about the paper just read.

Mr. WITHERS. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator spoke of the section as it is in the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Let the line speaking of rank be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The portion of the communication referred to by the Senator from Illinois will be read again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

If the tenor of legislation was not opposed to any increase of the number of staff officers already allowed by law, I would recommend further the enactment of a clause to say: That any commissioned military officer once a major and assistant adjutant-general of volunteers, who has been or shall be for fifteen years on duty in the office of the Secretary of War, without change of station during that time, shall be entitled to the rank, pay, and allowances of major and assistant adjutant-general in the Army.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no criticism whatever to make on that paper; I merely call attention to that paragraph of it, so that Senators can readily understand by whom it was prepared and why it was prepared, for the purpose of obtaining the character of legislation that I mentioned, which attempt is made at nearly every session of Congress to promote some particular person in the Army to a higher grade than he is entitled to. By such means many persons in Washington City to-day hold a grade much higher than that which they would have received under the law in the Army if they had been left to regular promotions in the Army. It is that character of legislation that I object to, and especially in a bill of this kind. Surely we ought not in an appropriation bill for the support of the Army to discriminate between officers of the Army of the same rank.

If this gentleman is not willing under the rank of captain to remain in Washington City and perform this duty, it is very easy for the Secretary of War to detail some man who is a major in the Army, for he evidently means to say that no man of less rank than major ought to perform this duty. If so, let him detail one of that rank; there are plenty of them, and there is no reason why this special action should be had. If there are no majors in the Army, then he can detail a lieutenant or a captain. There are lieutenants to-day in the Army under your law who are receiving the pay and emoluments of colonels in the Army, which is all wrong, and ought not to be recognized as consistent with promotion and regular rank in the Army.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator from Illinois doubtless knew when that paragraph was read from the communication of the Secretary of War that it had no reference to the section of the bill under consideration, and the word "rank" being used in that does not constitute an objection, for the fact is that the word "rank" is not used in the section under consideration.

Mr. LOGAN. I know it is not used in the bill; the language there is only "pay, emoluments, and allowances."

Mr. WITHERS. The section of the bill under consideration has no connection with that part of the communication from the Secretary of War which the Senator has had reported. That related to a different matter.

Mr. LOGAN. Then why did you have it read?

Mr. WITHERS. I had the communication read because it pertained to this section. There are portions of it which are not applicable to this section and which contain other suggestions that the Committee on Appropriations paid no attention to and have reported nothing in connection with. I presume the objection of the Senator was regarded by the House as a valid objection, inasmuch as they made no provision for the increase of rank which he objects to as pernicious legislation.

Mr. LOGAN. But what is the difference, so far as the Treasury is concerned, whether you give the man the rank or give him the pay of that rank? You do not give him the rank, because that is merely for the purpose of showing that you do not wish to make distinctions by special legislation to legislate a man into a rank he is not entitled to, but by the same legislation you give him the pay just as if he had the rank, and thereby give him assimilated rank; so that there is no difference, so far as the effect is concerned, on the pay and emoluments of the office.

Mr. WITHERS. There is no difference as to the pay and emoluments, but there is certainly a great difference as to rank. This officer, being detailed, may be changed from time to time. The section only provides that while he is discharging these onerous and important duties, which all the testimony goes to show he has discharged with extraordinary fidelity and efficiency, he shall receive an increase of pay equal to the difference between his actual rank and the rank next above him, only to continue, however, for the time he is thus serving. As soon as another detail shall be made, the recipient of it at present would fail to receive it, and the person who is subsequently detailed would receive it. That is all.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to detain the Senate, but I desire to call the Senator's attention to this point: do you not by your legislation put it out almost I will not say of the power, but does not your legislation so enact it that no major or lieutenant-colonel ever will be detailed to perform this duty? Is it not a fact that by this provision naturally some person with the rank of captain will always be selected so that he may get the pay of a major? If you detailed a major, he would then get the rank of lieutenant-colonel. There would be complaint of that, and hence the Secretary would be likely always to detail a lieutenant so that he may get a captain's pay, or a captain so he may get a major's pay; but he will not go above that. Is not that the effect of it? Is not the effect of this section to put it in the hands of a person of a certain rank to be detailed for this duty, because the Secretary of War says the rank of major ought to be the rank to perform this duty? Hence he details one rank less that the officer may be promoted by raising his pay and emoluments to those of the assimilated rank of major. That is the effect of your section.

Mr. WITHERS. I will say that there is no restriction whatever in the section as to the rank of the officer who shall be detailed for this service. It only provides that the officer who may be detailed shall receive the pay and emoluments of the next highest rank.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course there is no restriction, but the Secretary of War in his letter states to the committee that the duty ought to be performed by an officer with the rank of major. If it ought to be the rank of major he will not detail an officer of higher rank; but under this section he will always detail an officer of lower rank than major that he may be promoted to major, and that is the object of it. It has no other object in view. It is strange if there is but one man in the United States Army qualified to perform this duty; very strange, indeed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. This discussion satisfies me that this section ought to go out without reference to the question whether the proposition is intrinsically right or not. The Committee on Military Affairs, that is supposed to be more familiar with the operations of the Army and its bureaus than the Committee on Appropriations and the rest of us, has had no opportunity, as these bills are framed, to examine this at all, and I think it is one of those eminent instances (and they run all through the appropriation bills and the sooner we can stop it the better) where there is no great political or other crisis that affects liberty or anything else pending, to make it necessary to hitch it on to an appropriation bill in order to coerce somebody; but it is just a simple proposition to make a change of the law upon a topic that the appropriation bill has no earthly connection with. This appropriation bill is a bill to provide pay for the Army. Now, then, you propose on this bill to pay the Army, to regulate the fees and allowances of one particular person out of the hundreds of persons or the scores of persons analogously situated in the War Department by an independent act of fresh legislation. I submit to the Committee on Appropriations whether that is right—I do not mean right in respect of whether the proposition in and of itself is good or bad; we have not the means of examining that critically now by an inquiry of a committee that devotes itself to that class of subjects specially and exclusively; but whether it is right, in providing appropriations of money to pay the statute allowances that are made to officers and soldiers, to introduce into such a bill a special, new law of this kind.

As I say, there is no pressing public exigency that calls upon Congress to jump to its feet and as the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] sometimes says "turn on the lights" in order to have this done in quick haste. There is time enough to introduce a bill, if this is a good thing, and have it sent to the Military Committees of the two Houses of Congress for them to look over the whole field and see how it bears upon other officers who are similarly situated, see whether it promotes discontent and inequalities, and then to do what appears to be right.

But another suggestion occurs to me. On the clause itself it might be suggested, as the Senator from Virginia says that this proposed statute does not limit the selection of an examiner of State claims to a lieutenant or a captain, that the officer detailed may be a brigadier-general and the detail may be changed from time to time. If a brigadier-general should be selected—and we have more officers of that rank than are necessary for field purposes just now as everybody says, I do not know how it is myself,—if the Secretary of War should call upon a brigadier-general to do this duty, the brigadier-general would at once have the pay and allowances of a major-general. That would not be right. It would not be right on the merits of it because the pay of a brigadier-general is sufficient for him to leave the field or his post and come to Washington and live here and do this duty. That ought to be considered. It runs clear up as well as clear down; and therefore I submit in all sincerity on a bill of this kind that this is not the place to go into an inquiry as to the fitness of this thing and that there is no imminent public exigency which calls upon us to do it.

Mr. WITHERS. The objection of the Senator from Vermont applies principally, then, to the vexed subject of legislation upon appropriation bills, and if he desires to prune this bill from all legislative provisions he will have to strike out a good many of its antecedent provisions as well as subsequent ones. But inasmuch as this bill substantially received the assent of that Senator at the last session of Congress, I could scarcely suppose that it was so pernicious and vicious to do in the month of April what it was perfectly proper to do in the month of February.

I have nothing further to say in regard to that matter. Every general appropriation bill that has been passed since I have been a member of this body has contained legislative provisions, and this, of course, ought to contain certain legislative provisions.

The second objection urged by the Senator is well taken, if it constitutes an objection, that there is no restriction upon the selection of the officer who shall be detailed for this particular service, and it is entirely within the discretion of the Secretary of War, if he see proper to do so, to detail any officer of the Army for this service; but I should be willing myself to trust to the discretion and knowledge of the Secretary of War of the special talents and aptitude required for the position, which they, I think, would suffice him to select the officer who is most adapted and best calculated to discharge these duties most efficiently and properly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. One word. Perhaps the reason has been given before, but I have not heard it, having been engaged. So I venture to ask what reason is there for giving a man more pay for staying in Washington than being in actual service?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. WITHERS. If the Senator from Georgia had been present when the communication of the Secretary of War was read to the Senate, he would have understood the reasons, which are briefly these: that in view of the very extensive labors which devolve on this officer, and the necessity of peculiar talent for the character of service which he is required to perform, it demands rather an extraordinary combination of qualities which should, in the Secretary's opinion, entitle him to greater emolument than is allowed to his actual rank.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to ask the Senator a question right there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Vermont some time ago.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg pardon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If Senators would address the Chair when they rise, then I should have made my speech a good while ago and should have finished. I wanted to reply to what the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] had said, and addressed the Chair for that purpose, so that what I should say in respect of my agreement to the last Army bill that did not become a law might go in connection with his remarks because he does me great injustice and has fallen into an error on that subject.

I tried to the extent of my humble capacity on one or two clauses of the old Army bill to have them stricken out on the very ground that I state now, that they were legislative provisions changing the general law, that had no relation to the expenditure of the money that was appropriated. I failed, ignominiously failed I may say, in those one or two instances, and, therefore, I thought it would be merely flying in the face of fate to try it any more; but I did not therefore acquiesce in or assent to the passage of the last Army bill, which failed to become a law, with any legislation on it at all. It was against my judgment as I expressed it, against what I believed to be sound principles of legislation, and I try this motion now rather as an experiment to see, on a point where there is not any great question involved as it is supposed there is in some other sections, whether there is left any disposition in the Senate to keep appropriation bills clear of independent legislation and to relieve the Committee on Appropriations in the haste that they are obliged to act in from being obliged to try every question and dispose of it in the Senate and those that may be thrust in, in the way of amendment either coming from the House or here, because the Committee on Appropriations is just as much bound, and of course it would be glad to consider every proposition that is sent to it from this body as well as from the House of Representatives. They ought to stand on an equal footing, we all agree. That being the case, I most emphatically deny that I assented to the last Army bill in any of the respects to which my honorable friend from Virginia alludes. He is in error about that although as I say when I found the effort was entirely useless I did not think it was courteous to the Senate to be trying the question over and over again after the majority of the Senate had decided against me.

That is all I wish to say. I apologize to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to say that the statement of the Senator from Vermont is of course conclusive on the subject, but my recollection differs somewhat from his. My recollection is, that while it is true he raised the point to which he alludes with regard to other sections of the bill, this particular section which was embodied in the bill escaped his criticism upon that occasion; but I say I do not assert so now; in view of his disclaimer I withdraw that suggestion. I only say one thing is certain, that the Army bill which passed this body at the last session contained sundry legislative provisions, and that it received the assent, according to my recollection, upon a yea-and-nay-vote, of the republican members of this body. I presume the Senator voted with his party. If it was a violent presumption or an erroneous assumption, of course I withdraw the statement so far as he is concerned.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask the Senator from Virginia a question. Why is it that the necessity has arisen now for giving the pay and emoluments of a major of cavalry to this officer when nearly all the claims of the States have been settled? This examination has been going on for years; and why was this discovery not made until recently?

Mr. WITHERS. Does the Senator desire an answer?

Mr. LOGAN. I ask why the committee have not provided heretofore, why they waited until these claims are nearly all settled, and then propose to increase the pay of this officer?

Mr. WITHERS. Is the Senator prepared to state that such is the fact?

Mr. LOGAN. I am not upon the Committee on Appropriations. If I were I would be prepared to state the exact facts, for I would examine into them.

Mr. WITHERS. I merely wish, in connection with the question of the Senator from Illinois, to call attention to the facts embodied in the letter of the Secretary of War, in which he states the aggregate amount of claims which have been adjusted and settled by this officer within the last fiscal year. Those figures would indicate certainly that a very large number required still to be examined and adjusted.

Mr. LOGAN. These claims of various States have been in process of adjustment for a number of years; and it would seem to me, although I have no definite idea in reference to it, that there must be a very small proportion of them now left in the War Department for settlement. I will call the attention of the Senator to this section, which reads:

> And the examiner of State claims in the office of the Secretary of War shall have, while on such duty, the pay, emoluments, and allowances of mounted officers one grade higher than that held by him in his regiment or corps.

Under this section will he be entitled to receive the pay and emoluments from now on, or will he be entitled to receive the pay and emoluments for all the time he has been in this service?

Mr. WITHERS. I presume the operation of the law would not be retroactive, and he would only receive the pay and emoluments here provided for from the time of the passage of the act.

Mr. LOGAN. I remember several cases passing through the Senate where the officers drew pay back as far as five years under very similar provisions.

Mr. WITHERS. That was by special act.

Mr. LOGAN. No; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. WITHERS. All the cases I remember were by special act.

Mr. LOGAN. No; it was by an act just like this, which had no special reference to pay before its passage, but fixed the pay of the officer while engaged in certain duties. This has the same provision precisely, that he shall have certain pay for performing certain duties. Under that language, will he not receive pay back for several years? Will it not be so construed?

Mr. WITHERS. I cannot say what may have been done in the past; but certainly the construction I should place on this law, and which I am very sure is placed by the Committee on Appropriations and by the House which passed it, is that it should not be retroactive, but should apply only from and after the passage of the act.

Mr. LOGAN. I only ask is it not susceptible of such a construction, and would it not be, likely, the construction given to it in the War Department, for I know how liberal they are in reference to construction when pay comes in?

Mr. BLAINE. I have no doubt that the provision is a just one so far as it relates to the existing officer. I have no doubt that he is entitled to and earns all the pay this provision will give him. But I agree with the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Vermont that, as the section stands, it is not a good provision to be inserted, although I agreed to it at the last session, and for this reason: it leaves without limit the rank of the officer detailed, and, as the Senator from Vermont suggested, a brigadier-general may be called in and receive the pay of a major-general. And then it ought not, I think, to be made unlimited as to time, because long after the usefulness of this, long after the application of it has gone by, this little indulgence will be nursed, and nursed very tenderly and carefully in Army circles, if I may say so, and therefore I should like to put in at the end of the section a limitation of this kind:

> Provided, That the pay and emoluments shall not be increased if the officer detailed holds a rank higher than major: And provided further, That this increase of pay shall not be allowed after four years from the date of the passage of this act.

I think that time ought to wind up the work, and I think such a limitation would prevent favoritism in the way of detailing an officer of already high rank in order to give him a thousand or two thousand dollars extra for the mere nominal duty he performs.

Mr. BECK. I am not entirely satisfied with the section as it stands; but believing that no matter so small as this ought to make any change in the bill and send it back to the House where perhaps a wrangle will be had again, I hope the amendment will not be adopted, giving the Senator from Maine full assurance that I will unite with him, and I believe we all will, if there is any abuse of this section and a brigadier-general is appointed, or any officer high in rank, or anything done that ought not to be done, when we meet in December, to repeal it promptly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. Never put off until to-morrow that which we can do so well to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I had the floor and addressed the Chair first, let me tell my friend from Maine.

The Senator from Virginia, Mr. President, says that I did not perform as well as I ought to have done on this section at the last session.

Mr. WITHERS. No; I withdrew all I said in regard to it on account of the Senator's disclaimer being perfectly conclusive.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will clinch the conclusion then by reading the Journal. It proceeds to report that on the 24th of February this matter being under consideration, "on the question to concur in the following amendment made as in Committee of the Whole on page 14 strike out the words" "it was determined in the negative" by a certain vote. There I appear to have voted in the negative on that just as the Senator says he thinks I did not object to the legislation. Then the Journal proceeds to say:

> So the amendment was not concurred in.

On motion by Mr. EDMUNDS that the Senate reconsider its vote non-concurring in the amendment last named it was determined in the negative—yeas 26, nays 38.

And "Mr. EDMUNDS" appears to have voted in the affirmative. This recalls to my recollection that I think I myself made the objection to begin with that this was putting into this bill a thing that ought not to be in it, but I am not sure about that.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. This part of the bill was struck out by the Committee on Appropriations. It was found in that portion of the bill which reorganized the Army, which was wholly struck out by the Committee on Appropriations, and so it was put in the reported bill. Then my honorable friend from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] asked to except from the Army reorganization sections this provision relating to this particular officer, and after some discussion and consideration, in which the Senator from Missouri took a prominent part, this exception was made, and it was reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am quite sure that I opposed the adoption of this clause and that I voted with the majority on concurring in order to move to reconsider the vote as the Senate was thin, and I did make the motion instantly, and that motion was lost. Of course it is of very little importance to the Senate whether I am consistent or not. We have got a better Senate, it is supposed by some people, than we had on the former occasion, a reform, a body of men who are going to have the Constitution and the laws completely observed and things are to proceed in a regular way. Now, Mr. President, let us begin this good work on this auspicious and first occasion by having an appropriation bill really an appropriation bill, where the provision in question does not affect the liberties of mankind or anything of that sort.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator's statement is to me perfectly conclusive in regard to his position on this question. I concede it. His last declaration is equally true that we propose to enter upon an era of reform in the administration of the Government under the auspices of the democratic majority. We propose to do that very thing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to amend the bill by striking out section 3.

Mr. BLAINE. I think my amendment takes precedence of that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is to perfect the paragraph. Undoubtedly the amendment of the Senator is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Maine will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to section 3:

Provided, That the pay and emoluments shall not be increased if the officer detailed holds a rank higher than major: And provided further, That this increase of pay shall not be allowed after four years from the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. WITHERS. With reference to the amendment just reported, offered by the Senator from Maine, I can only say that the view which influenced the committee in reporting the bill without amendment to this body will control me in voting against that proposed amendment, however unobjectionable it may be in itself. But I will call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that no very great abuse is likely to arise under the operation of this section before Congress will meet again in December next, and if any should arise, with the presence of the Senator from Maine as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, we may with great confidence look forward to its speedy rectification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDMUNDS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] upon all political questions, and his colleague was to determine what they were; but I infer from what has been said by the Senator from Virginia that certain views whatever they may be lead our friends on the other side not to allow any amendments to this bill, and therefore I suppose that Governor HARRIS if he were here would vote against this amendment. Therefore I shall not vote.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] to-day upon all political questions. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] upon political questions. I shall not vote on this question.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. KERNAN] on all political questions, and as this has assumed the phase of a political question, I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. ANTHONY, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I voted inadvertently. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] on all political questions. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The votes will be withdrawn.

Mr. BECK, (after having voted in the negative.) Not supposing this was a political question, when my name was called I voted "nay." I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] As this has seemed to assume that shape, I ask leave to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. WINDOM, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS,] and therefore I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] on political questions, and requested me to announce that fact.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Allison,	Chandler,	Kirkwood,	Plumb,
Bell,	Conkling,	Logan,	Rollins,
Blaine,	Dawes,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Booth,	Ferry,	Morrill,	Teller.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,
Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Platt,

NAYS—27.

Bailey,	Garland,	Lamar,	Vest,
Bayard,	Groome,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Call,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,	Wallace,
Coke,	Houston,	Randolph,	Williams,
Eaton,	Jonas,	Slater,	Withers.
Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,

ABSENT—26.

Anthony,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Bruce,	Gordon,	Kellogg,	Thurman,
Burnside,	Grover,	Kernan,	Whyte,
Butler,	Hamlin,	McDonald,	Windom.
Carpenter,	Harris,	McPherson,
Davis of Illinois,	Hoar,	Ransom,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to strike out the third section.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the criticism made by the Senator from Illinois is a correct one as to the language with reference to the time when this officer's increased pay shall begin. My attention was not called to it until the citicism was made by the Senator. It seems to me that this meritorious officer, and I believe he is meritorious, if this section shall pass as it stands will be entitled to receive the pay and emoluments of a major of cavalry, not only from the time of the passage of this act, but during all the time he has been in the discharge of this service. Therefore I move to insert the word "hereafter," so that the pay provided for here shall begin from the passage of the law. In line 2, after the words "shall have," I propose to insert the word "hereafter," so as to read:

And the examiner of State claims in the office of the Secretary of War shall have hereafter, while on such duty, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WITHERS. I will simply state that that is precisely what the section provides for as it stands at present. It is an axiom, I think, accepted generally by all persons who construe laws, that laws are always prospective in their operation unless it shall be specifically stated to the contrary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

A division was called for.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) Believing this to be an issue whether the bill shall be amended or no, and therefore political, and being paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] on political questions, I do not vote. I should vote "nay" if I felt at liberty to do so.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. KERNAN] on all political questions, and as this has assumed that shape, I decline to vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS, (when his name was called.) I am paired, I believe, on this question with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.] I should vote in favor of this amendment if I were at liberty to vote.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when Mr. GORDON'S name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] on political questions, and therefore I declined to vote when my name was called.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLAINE. I ought to have stated earlier that my colleague, [Mr. HAMLIN,] who is absent from the Chamber, is paired on all political questions with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] I did not suppose at the outset that these were political questions, or I should have made the announcement earlier.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Allison,	Chandler,	Kirkwood,	Plumb,
Bell,	Conkling,	Logan,	Rollins,
Blaine,	Dawes,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Booth,	Ferry,	Morrill,	Teller.
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,
Cameron of Wis.,	Ingalls,	Platt,

NAYS—26.

Bailey,	Garland,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Bayard,	Groome,	Maxey,	Walker,
Call,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Wallace,
Cockrell,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,	Williams,
Coke,	Houston,	Slater,	Withers.
Eaton,	Jonas,	Vance,
Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Vest,

ABSENT—27.

Anthony,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Beck,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Bruce,	Gordon,	Kellogg,	Sharon,
Burnside,	Grover,	Kernan,	Thurman,
Butler,	Hamlin,	McDonald,	Whyte,
Carpenter,	Harris,	McPherson,	Windom.
Davis of Illinois,	Hoar,	Randolph,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to strike out section 3.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 4. That when a vacancy occurs in the office of professor of the French language or in the office of professor of the Spanish language in the Military Academy, both these offices shall cease, and the remaining one of the two professors shall be professor of modern languages; and thereafter there shall be in the Military Academy one, and only one, professor of modern languages; and that section 1336 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended by inserting, after the word "service," in the first line, the words "as professor."

SEC. 5. That each member of the next two graduating classes of the Military Academy, after graduation, may elect to receive the gross sum of $750 and mileage to his place of residence; and the acceptance of this gross sum shall render him ineligible to appointment in the Army until two years after his graduation; and the amount required to defray the expenditure herein provided for shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia what the meaning of the word "mileage" is in that connection? I am not able to see in the Revised Statutes any provision for mileage to cadets. There is a provision for officers of the Army traveling on duty where transportation is not furnished, that they shall have a certain mileage; but I am not able to see that that statute would refer to this case.

Mr. WITHERS. I was under the impression that there was a general provision of the statutes fixing eight cents as the rate for officers of the Army.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But a cadet is not an officer in the Army, and the bill itself recognizes the fact but he may be appointed after that in the Army.

Mr. WITHERS. I must confess the attention of the committee was not directed to that question in investigating this matter, the section being identical with a section of the bill of last session. I presumed the rate of mileage was fixed by law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not, and I move to insert after the word "mileage" the words "allowed to officers of the Army," so as to cover the point.

Mr. WITHERS. That would be a very sufficient provision; but inasmuch as it is entirely unnecessary, as no mileage can be allowed unless it is provided for by law now, it is not necessary to amend the section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I never knew a bill so confessedly imperfect as this which was yet so good that it should not be amended; but I will ask a vote on the motion. My amendment is after the word "mileage" to insert:

Allowed by law to officers of the Army traveling on duty.

Mr. WITHERS. I would ask the Senator if it would be possible for any other mileage to be allowed provided his amendment were not adopted?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the section would allow any mileage that the cadet and either the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Treasury might agree upon. I am sure the Senator does not wish to have this bill in a loose condition of that sort, unless there is some purpose that is not disclosed in the Senate that has occurred in some other place somewhere to take it with all its imperfections, whatever they may be, hit or miss. If that be the purpose let it only be announced, and of course that will save us a great deal of trouble in trying to make suggestions, which it is supposed to be the right of Senators to do to perfect a bill.

Mr. WITHERS. The Committee on Appropriations are of opinion that the authorities at West Point are gentlemen of sufficient integrity not to make an allowance which is not authorized by law, and the Senator himself has stated that there is no provision of law fixing the rate of mileage except at the same fixed by his amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. Would it not be fair, I may ask my friend from Virginia, to assume that this referred to the mileage with which Senators and Representatives are most familiar, twenty cents a mile, the mileage that we know something about? What other way can you construe the word "mileage?"

Mr. LOGAN. The mileage of marshals.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; it might be supposed to mean the mileage allowed United States marshals.

Mr. WITHERS. All this is amusing by-play undoubtedly; but the construction I would place on it is that if there is a provision of law fixing the rate of mileage that provision will be observed in paying mileage in this instance. If there be no provision of law authorizing the payment of mileage, then no mileage will be paid, and the word will be mere surplusage.

Mr. BLAINE. As my friend says, this may be amusing by-play; but I ask him whether if this question now comes to the yeas and nays it will be regarded by our friends across the way as a political question? I noticed awhile ago that when it was proposed to strike out the word "and" and insert "that" in place of it, it was regarded as a political question, and the Senate divided on the political line as between those two conjunctions, one being plainly ungrammatical and the other grammatical. Now, I am allowed to infer, of course, that anything short of that or beyond it is also a political question.

Mr. WITHERS. It is not the province of the Senator from Virginia to decide what is or is not political; but the Senator from Virginia will venture to suggest that while it is possible that a doubt might exist in the minds of some as to whether the substitution proposed would or would not involve a political principle, the Senator from Virginia is clearly of opinion that an amendment to this bill is political.

Mr. BLAINE. Even if it be a mere conjunction or pronoun! I only wanted information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the fifth section.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. I notice on lines 9 and 10 of section 4 an amendment of the Revised Statutes by referring to them and inserting a certain word in the first line of a certain section. Now if it would not be regarded as political, I would move to add "so that the section will read," repeating the section as it is amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before that is done I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island which Revised Statutes he refers to. In legal contemplation the Revised Statutes are the rolls on file in the Department of State. Whether this appears in the first line there or not, I do not know. Then we have got two printed editions of the Revised Statutes, a first and second edition. Now which of these three is it that my friend wishes to have read so and so?

Mr. ANTHONY. I refer to the second edition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill does not refer to the second edition.

Mr. WITHERS. Inasmuch as the Senators over the way do not seem able to agree on the character of the amendment they propose, I hope it will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] to section 4.

The amendment was rejected.

The Chief Clerk read the sixth section, as follows:

SEC. 6. That section 2002 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States: Provided, That nothing contained in this section, as now amended, shall be held or deemed to abridge or affect the duty or power of the President of the United States, under section 5297 of the Revised Statutes, enacted under and to enable the United States to comply with section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, on application of the Legislature or executive, as provided for in said section."

And that section 5528 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years."

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. EATON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will move to strike out the clause first.

Mr. EATON. Oh, no; I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to interpose a motion that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next?

Mr. EATON. I withdraw my motion to allow the Senator from Delaware to move an amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. WITHERS. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. EATON. I did not withdraw my motion for an amendment of that sort.

Mr. BAYARD. I asked my friend from Connecticut to withdraw his motion for the purpose of my substituting for it a motion that we should not sit to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to make a suggestion to him? Under the rules it is competent to move that the Senate do now adjourn, to meet on Monday next. I wish to suggest to him that if he make that motion he will get more votes for it than he will for the other.

Mr. BAYARD. I had the impression that if I made the motion in that form, a motion to adjourn would take precedence; but the Senator from Connecticut will allow my motion to be substituted for his, as I understand?

Mr. EATON. No, I will not.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. EATON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask the Senator to yield to me that I may offer an amendment to the pending bill with a view to having it printed.

Mr. EATON. I will allow that to be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senator to yield to me for the same purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota will be received, and ordered to be printed. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. Now, I insist on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. EATON. I think we had better sit here longer if we are going to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. WITHERS. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Georgia who is absent, [Mr. GORDON.] I hardly know whether this is a political question or not. I believe the Senator who made the motion is a democrat in good standing; but I will ask the other Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] if this is regarded as a political question. I do not see him present, and I will not vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have consulted my political doctor of divinity, the Senator from Georgia who is present, [Mr. HILL,] who informs me this is not a political question, that he voted yea, and that his colleague would vote so himself if he were here. I vote "yea."

Mr. EATON, (after having voted in the negative.) On this question I am paired with my friend from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Allison,	Cameron of Wis.,	Jones of Florida,	Teller,
Anthony,	Chandler,	Kirkwood,	Vance,
Bayard,	Cockrell,	Lamar,	Voorhees
Beck,	Conkling,	Logan,	Wallace,
Bell,	Dawes,	Morrill,	Williams.
Blaine,	Groome,	Plumb,
Booth,	Hill of Georgia,	Ransom,
Call,	Ingalls,	Saulsbury,

NAYS—22.

Bailey,	Hereford,	Paddock,	Slater,
Burnside,	Hill of Colorado,	Pendleton,	Vest,
Cameron of Pa.,	Houston,	Platt,	Walker,
Coke,	McMillan,	Randolph,	Withers.
Ferry,	Maxey,	Rollins,
Garland,	Morgan,	Saunders,

ABSENT—24.

Bruce,	Edmunds,	Hoar,	McDonald,
Butler,	Farley,	Johnston,	McPherson,
Carpenter,	Gordon,	Jonas,	Sharon,
Davis of Illinois,	Grover,	Jones of Nevada,	Thurman.
Davis of W. Va.,	Hamlin,	Kellogg,	Whyte,
Eaton,	Harris,	Kernan,	Windom.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 11, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PORTRAIT OF THE LATE JOSEPH HENRY.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, I move by unanimous consent to take from the table joint resolution S. R. No. 17, authorizing the printing of a portrait of the late Joseph Henry, to accompany the memorial volume heretofore ordered, for action at this time.

There was no objection, and the joint resolution was taken up, read a first and second time, and ordered to a third reading. It was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLYMER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. WILLITS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That John Strong, jr., a member of the Michigan Legislature, be admitted to the privilege of the floor to-day.

FOLDING OF SPEECHES.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the Chair and the House to a matter of pressing necessity. I do not know whether we have the power to correct what is complained of before the Committee of Accounts has been appointed. A good deal of complaint has been made that it is now impossible for members to get their speeches folded. Some have been a week at the folding-room. I ask the Chair whether he has any authority in any temporary way to remedy the difficulty?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi has made two efforts to introduce a resolution to provide a temporary remedy, but there has been objection each time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope he may have unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. He has given the Chair notice that he wishes to be recognized at this time to make another effort.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope there will be no objection to the resolution.

Mr. CHALMERS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the superintendent of the folding-room is hereby authorized to employ such additional force as may be necessary to fold the speeches now largely accumulated and accumulating in said room, to be paid for out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $1 per thousand, and subject to the approval of the Committee of Accounts.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule this resolution would have to go first to the Committee of Accounts, and hence it is that it requires unanimous consent.

Mr. GARFIELD. That does not render it inoperative until the Committee of Accounts has been appointed?

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent the rule has been waived which compels the reference of this resolution to the Committee of Accounts. There is no money in the contingent fund from which this money is to be paid and the persons who are employed to do this work will of course have to trust to the future.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. CHALMERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed with the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the pending amendment, moved by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MONEY.]

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 73, line 1793, strike out the word "five" and insert "six;" in the same line strike out "fourteen" and insert "sixteen;" in line 1794, after the word "twenty," strike out "two" and insert "five;" and in same line strike out, after the word "thirty," the word "three," and insert "four;" and in line 1796 strike out the word "six," after the word "fifty," and insert "seven;" on page 74, line 1799, strike out the word "seventy-six" and insert "eighty-nine;" after the word "thousand," in the same line, strike out the word "nine" and insert "five;" and at the end of the paragraph add "$2,000 of which shall be immediately available for temporary clerks;" so it will read:

For Third Assistant Postmaster-General, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,000; chief of division of dead letters, $2,250; chief of division of postage-stamps, $2,250; six clerks of class 4; sixteen clerks of class 3; twenty-five clerks of class 2; thirty-four clerks of class 1; six clerks, at $1,000 each; fifty-seven female clerks, at $900 each; three assistant messengers; for seven laborers; four female laborers, at $480 each; in all, $189,500; $2,000 of which shall be immediately available for temporary clerks.

Mr. MONEY demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 57; no quorum voting.

The Chairman appointed as tellers Mr. ATKINS and Mr. MONEY.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 105, noes 60.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Department of Agriculture:

For compensation of the Commissioner of Agriculture, $3,600; chief clerk, $1,900; entomologist, $1,900; chemist, $1,900; assistant chemist, $1,400; two assistant chemists, at $1,200 each; superintendent of experimental gardens and grounds, $1,900; statistician, $1,900; disbursing clerk, $1,600; superintendent of seed-room, $1,600; librarian, $1,400; botanist, $1,800; microscopist, $1,800; engineer, $1,200; three clerks of class 4; four clerks of class 3; five clerks of class 2; six clerks of class 1; five clerks, at $1,000 each; superintendent of flower-seed room, $900; superintendent of folding-room, $1,200; assistant curator in museum, $1,000; and for copyists, laborers, watchmen, carpenters, and other necessary force, $9,500; in all, $69,900; and in addition to the proper vouchers and accounts therefor to the accounting officers of the Treasury, the Commissioner of Agriculture shall present a detailed statement of the manner of the expenditure of this sum, to accompany his estimates to be presented at the next regular session of Congress: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be paid to any person receiving at the same time other compensation as an officer or employé of the Government.

Mr. AIKEN. I move, in line 1871, to strike out "thirty-six hundred" and insert "four thousand," so it will read: "For compensation of the Commissioner of Agriculture, $4,000;" and, in line 1892, to strike out "sixty-nine thousand nine hundred" and insert "seventy thousand three hundred."

Mr. ATKINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman from South Carolina offers to increase the salary of this officer, I make the point of order not only on his amendment but on the provision of the bill providing for the increase of that officer's salary as being contrary to law.

Mr. AIKEN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I shall not withdraw it.

Mr. COX. Were points of order reserved on this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. All points of order were reserved upon the bill.

Mr. AIKEN. In the bill the gentleman from Tennessee proposes to increase the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture. And now, as I understand him, because I propose to increase it beyond the point fixed in the bill, he not only makes the point of order on my proposition, but he makes it on his own proposition.

Mr. ATKINS. I do, and I am perfectly consistent in doing so. I am not responsible for this increase in the bill of this gentleman's salary. I stated when I introduced the bill that I did it at the request of gentlemen on this side and on the other side of the House, on the basis of the conference report. It was the conference report which raised the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture from $3,000 to $3,600, and I was content to leave it there if it was the sense of the House to pass the bill on the basis of the conference report. But if the gentleman from South Carolina intends to go beyond that conference report and still further increase the salary of the Commissioner, I feel bound to make the point of order not only on his amendment but on the proposition of the bill providing for an increase of salary. There is no law to authorize such a thing, and it is contrary to law. This salary was put at $4,000 under the salary-grab act. The act repealing that law put it back to $3,000, where it has been since; and there is no doubt about the point of order lying both against the amendment and the proposition of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. As a question of law I desire to correct my friend from Tennessee. If he refers to the Revised Statutes he will find that so much of the salary bill as referred to members and officers of Congress was repealed, but the portion referring to other officers of the Government was not repealed; and you will find in the general law now in the Revised Statutes the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture fixed at $4,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Virginia send up the statute to which he refers?

Mr. AIKEN. Pending the investigation as to what is the present law, I call the attention of the House to one peculiar fact. In the bill now under consideration there are six or eight officers of this Government each styled Commissioner, and if there is any significance in the title it must have some relevancy to the duties of the office and the responsibility of the party filling it. And it is to me passing strange that the Commissioner of Agriculture, one of the great functionaries of this country, a man who has the entire control of the agricultural department of the country so far as the Government is concerned, has a salary $1,000 less than any other officer of the Government who bears the same title.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the Chair to confine the gentleman from South Carolina to a discussion of the point of order. He is now entering upon the merits of the question.

Mr. AIKEN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee answer me one question?

Mr. ATKINS. I will if I can.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I will now read the statute to which I referred. Section 521 of the Revised Statutes reads thus:

> The Department of Agriculture shall be under the charge of a Commissioner of Agriculture, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be entitled to a salary of $4,000 a year.

Mr. ATKINS. When was that passed?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. This statute was originally passed in 1862, and it is recopied into the revision of 1878 because it was not repealed by the act known as the repeal of the salary grab.

Mr. ATKINS. Was this salary not increased from $3,000 to $4,000 by the salary-grab act?

Mr. FORT. I think it was fixed at $4,000 in that act and the repeal did not affect this salary.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The repealing act did not repeal this. I referred to the section last year for my own information and found the fact to be as I have stated it. The point of order was made on this proposition last year and it was overruled; and I think the same chairman presided then as now. I remember Mr. Cutler, of New Jersey, proposed to increase the compensation of the Commissioner of Agriculture, and if the Clerk will refer to the Journal of the last session of Congress he will find that the point of order was made and overruled on the ground that the general law fixed the salary at $4,000.

Mr. ATKINS. In reply to the gentleman from Virginia I will say that the last appropriation act, and the one before that, and the one before that, fixed this salary at $3,000. These acts repeal any existing law on the subject. I take it that an appropriation act repeals any act to the contrary.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. All that was discussed in the last Congress, and it was then held that that did not repeal the general statutes of the United States and that an amendment to increase the salary was in order.

Mr. AIKEN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] a question. If I withdraw my amendment will he withdraw his point of order?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes; I will.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not choose to withdraw my amendment if no higher motive actuates the gentleman than that.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not understand the gentleman. I said I would withdraw the point of order.

Mr. AIKEN. The gentleman is willing to violate the law by increasing a salary from three thousand to three thousand six hundred dollars; but his conscience will not allow him to go further and to add $400 more.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to say to the gentleman from South Carolina that I can take care of my conscience myself. I wish moreover to say to the gentleman that I will not submit to any censorious remarks on his part with regard to my conscience or my motives on this floor.

Now, sir, I stated very frankly to this House the reasons why I had not made the point of order upon the proposition in this bill. I am not responsible, although it seems the gentleman cannot understand it, for the $3,600 in the bill for this officer. The House is responsible for it. The Congress of the United States is responsible for it. So far as that is concerned, the act was not passed into a law, but the conference committee had agreed to $3,600, and by common consent it was understood that we were to stand by the report of the committee of conference. All that was done by the consent of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. AIKEN,] because when I made the statement I never heard one solitary word of complaint or objection to it.

Now, it seems the gentleman thought he had set a trap in order to put me before the House as doing a thing that was not so conscientious, in his judgment, as it ought to be. I beg the gentleman's pardon, and I repeat that I am not responsible for the act, and the reason why I withdrew the point of order was that I wanted to let the bill go through the House on the basis of the conference report entirely; and it was for that reason, to some extent, that I objected to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MONEY,] although I felt that there was some justice in it. I simply desired the conference report to be the basis upon which this bill should pass through the House.

Mr. AIKEN. The gentleman says I do not understand his position. I confess I do not. He says he is willing that the salary shall be $3,600, and for which he is not responsible. I simply ask that it shall be $4,000. Why does not the gentleman from Tennessee make a point of order upon the bill itself? He does not object to that; he assents to it.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not; I was opposed to it on the floor and in the committee; I was opposed to it in the conference committee, but they finally agreed to it in adjusting the different features of the bill and put it at $3,600.

Mr. AIKEN. The bill was read and the gentleman made no objection to that feature of it. If I have any appreciation of what is going on in this House he gave his assent to the $3,600.

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman cannot understand the motives with which I presented it, I have nothing more to say.

Mr. AIKEN. Now, the law establishes the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture at $4,000, and I believe that the Commissioner should have that amount.

Mr. CHALMERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHALMERS. Is not the gentleman from Tennessee estopped from making a point of order after his own proposition has been read?

The CHAIRMAN. He is not; for the Journal shows that all points of order upon the bill were reserved by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] If the point of order is good against the amendment it must be equally good against the original provision.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. No; I cannot do it.

Mr. COX. I make that request.

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot do it after the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. AIKEN.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to say a word before the Chair decides the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule upon the point, but the Chair is perfectly willing to hear the gentleman from Virginia if he desires to be heard further.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I simply wanted to reiterate the fact that the general law fixes this salary at $4,000, and I do not think that an appropriation bill which simply provides an appropriation of $3,600 for the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture repeals the general statute. It only appropriates so much money toward carrying out the law.

The CHAIRMAN. If the salary of the officer rested alone upon the appropriation bills passed from year to year, the Chair would have no hesitation in ruling that the amount contained in the last appropriation bill, which is the existing law at the present time, was the amount provided for by existing law. The Chair has so decided; but where a statute unrepealed fixes the salary, as in this case, the Chair does not feel warranted in ruling that a salary fixed at a less sum by an appropriation bill repeals a statute. If there be any doubt about it, the Chair prefers to err on the safe side and submit the question to the committee. The Chair therefore entertains the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. BLOUNT. I trust that the House will not adopt this amendment. It is well known to the older members of the House that in 1876 the Committee on Appropriations examined into the officers of all the Departments as to their number and their salaries, and they made a report to this House which was adopted by it and became a law, resulting in a large reduction in the number of officers in these several Departments and a reduction in their salaries. A reduction of the cost of all the necessaries of life justified it, and I see no reason why we should change it at this time. There is just as much propriety in undoing every other act in regard to the Departments as there is in this particular instance. The reduction then made was commended by the whole country, and I do trust that this House, at the beginning, will show a determination to continue following the precedent set by the House for the last four years.

This is the beginning of the Congress, and if this change here is made there is no reason why similar changes should not be made in other instances. The rate of salary proposed here is higher than the salary paid to this officer for many years. Instead of increasing salaries the natural disposition would be to reduce them. There is no reason presented to this committee why the salary of this officer should be singled out and raised to the extent proposed. I do trust we will at the outset of this Congress take a proper position in reference to this question, because the precedent that we set now will probably obtain through the Congress.

Mr. SAMFORD. What was the salary of the Commissioner before?

Mr. BLOUNT. Three thousand dollars, and it is proposed to raise it 25 per cent. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] the other day charged, I think incorrectly, that the expenditures of the last Congress had been run up until they equaled those of the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. ELAM. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to finish my sentence first, and then if I have time I will yield. The gentleman from Ohio, as I said, charged, I think incorrectly, that the appropriations had been increased by the last Congress. The reduction of salaries was one of the means by which the reduction of expenditures was obtained. Now, if we are prepared to abandon the policy for which we have been commended by the people for the past four years this is the place and now is the time to commence that work. That is the whole of this question. I trust this House now and here will reassure the country that it does not intend to undo what it has been doing and boasting of for the last four years. I will now yield to the genleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELAM] for his question.

Mr. ELAM. The question I want to ask of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] is this: this is an appropriation bill, not a bill to fix the salaries of the officers named therein, for their salaries have already been fixed in the general statutes of the United States. Congress may refuse to appropriate as much as an officer is entitled to by law. But because it chooses at one session to do that, in my judgment as a lawyer it does not affect the rate of salary.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not yield to the gentleman for a speech in my time. I will say this to him: there is in the Revised Statutes a provision fixing the salary at a certain sum. But since that time and for years the salaries in all these Departments have been reduced, and the law officers of the Department have recognized the appropriation bills as the law of the case.

Mr. ELAM. Because they could not help themselves.

Mr. BLOUNT. And the Departments have sent in their estimates accordingly. I trust this House will see to it that there is no departure in this respect from its past course.

Mr. COVERT. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has asked the question why it is and how it is that the demand should be made at this time to increase the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture. I desire to answer that question very briefly if I can.

The gentleman knows, every member of this House knows, that within the last few months consternation has prevailed among farmers and agriculturists throughout the length and breadth of this land by reason of the rise and increase of cattle disease. This House has adopted a resolution directing a thorough official inquiry to be made as to how this disease arose and how it may be checked. The Commissioner of Agriculture is charged under the law with the investigation of this matter.

Mr. SAMFORD. Has not an appropriation been made for that specific purpose?

Mr. COVERT. Undoubtedly an appropriation was made for it, but the duties of the Commissioner of Agriculture are increased by reason of the fact that he is specially designated to oversee these inquiries and see that they shall be directed in the proper manner. I do not know how it is, but my experience in the last Congress demonstrated, at all events to my satisfaction, that this Agricultural Bureau is the one bureau of the Government that receives a kick upon every occasion when Congress is asked to make an appropriation for it. I cannot understand why it is that the Commissioner of Agriculture and his Department should be singled out to receive these kicks, these cuffs, these adverse criticisms on every occasion when an appropriation is to be made for the Department.

The attention of the House has been called to the fact that every other commissioner, the Commissioner of Patents, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, every other commissioner, receives a salary very much larger than the salary given to the Commissioner of Agriculture. I can see no reason why the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] should not prevail, and the salary of this Commissioner be restored to the rate fixed in the original law governing the Department.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Do you know of any disposition on the part of the present Commissioner of Agriculture to resign his office if the salary is not increased? And if he should resign will the office remain vacant?

Mr. COVERT. I do not; but that is not a reason to govern us in our action here.

Mr. FINLEY. All I desire to say is this: I understood the Chair to rule upon the point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] upon the statement of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS,] that the statute repealing what was known as the salary-grab law did not repeal the increased salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman misunderstood the Chair. The Chair did not rule upon any such point at all.

Mr. FINLEY. Very well. What I want to inquire of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] is this: the Forty-third Congress, I think it was, repealed what was known as the salary-grab law, the law changing the salaries of the officers named.

Now, is it not a fact that the present salary named in the compilation of the statutes was placed there by Ex-Secretary Boutwell? Did it not get into the Revised Statutes in that way? And does its being there re-enact the old law?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. If my friend will look to what is known as the salary-grab law—the act increasing the compensation of officers of the Government—he will find that it did not embrace the Commissioner of Agriculture; and therefore when that act was repealed the repeal did not affect the salary of this officer, who had not been included in the previous law. The salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture was fixed at $4,000 independently of the bill increasing salaries. If the gentleman will refer to the law he will find my statement correct.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Yes, sir, of course. I am only interested in the law of the question.

Mr. ATKINS. I understand the gentleman to say that the act approved March 3, 1873, did not increase the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture to $4,000?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That is my recollection.

Mr. ATKINS. Now, I have the book before me; and I state that it did increase that salary to $4,000.

Mr. FINLEY. And that has never been re-enacted by Congress, but was put in the Revised Statutes by Mr. Boutwell.

Mr. ATKINS. The act of January 20, 1874, repealed all increases of salary made by the act of March 3, 1873, except as to the President of the United States and the judges of the Supreme Court. The Chair, as I understood, ruled precisely upon this point yesterday. Here is the law. Here is the act of March 3, 1873, which fixed the salary of this officer at $4,000; here is the act of January 20, 1874, repealing the whole act of March 3, 1873, except that portion relating to the President of the United States and the judges of the Supreme Court. The case is as plain as anything on earth can be.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires the gentleman from Tennessee to understand that the only ruling which the present occupant of the chair has made, and the one under which the amendment was admitted, was that the salary of this officer was not dependent on the amount named in the annual appropriation bills, but was found fixed by the statute as it stands to-day. This is the only ground on which the Chair has ruled the amendment admissible.

Mr. ATKINS. My understanding is, that at the conclusion of all the appropriation bills which have been passed within the last three or four years there is a clause fixing the salaries of the various officers named in the bill at the sums therein appropriated.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that an important legal question is suggested in this discussion between the Chair and gentlemen on the floor, that question being whether any provision in an appropriation bill is to be construed as repealing an existing statute. It seems to me that it is proper to have a decision upon that question; and, as the Chair very properly suggested awhile ago, the question ought to be determined by the Committee of the Whole. It is one which may often arise hereafter; and we ought now to decide whether a provision incorporated in an appropriation bill repeals an existing law embraced in the statutes. I should like to have this question determined, because I deem it very important as a legal question. It is a well-known rule of legal construction that the later law repeals all the former ones in conflict with it. I have not examined this question, and am not prepared to say whether a provision in an appropriation bill should have the effect of repealing a law upon the statute-book; but I think it very important that the Committee of the Whole should now determine that point.

Mr. BLOUNT. As I understand, this question now comes to the Committee of the Whole on the amendment. The Chair allowed that amendment to come in to be voted on, declining to rule it out of order. Therefore, the question as to what is the law of this case cannot come distinctly before the committee. I have not, however, risen for the purpose of discussing that question.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment on this point?

Mr. BLOUNT. I will ask the Chair to recognize me hereafter.

Mr. ATKINS. Section 35, chapter 4, of the Revised Statutes reads:

Each Senator, Representative, and Delegate is entitled to a salary (except as to the Speaker) of $7,500 a year.

Now will the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] undertake to say that the members of this House are entitled to a salary of $7,500 a year? Yet such a claim would stand upon the very same basis as the claim that the Commissioner of Agriculture is entitled to $4,000 a year because that salary is named in the Revised Statutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that no appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair admitting the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, and that amendment has been discussed upon its merits. Had the gentleman from Tennessee, before the ruling was made, submitted to the Chair the information of which he now seems to be possessed, the ruling of the Chair might have been different. The Chair, through abundant caution, was disposed to give the Committee of the Whole the opportunity to vote on any proposition that was not clearly out of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. The question before the committee, therefore, is simply whether or not we shall increase the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture 25 per cent. at such a time as this when there has been a general decline in the value of the services of all persons not in the employ of the Government. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COVERT] says that whenever the Department of Agriculture is mentioned in this House it is simply the recipient of "kicks and blows." Now there is nothing in the history of this House for the last four years that justifies such an intimation. During the Forty-fourth Congress the Committee on Agriculture were consulted in reference to the appropriations for this Department, and the recommendations of that committee were agreed to on this floor. During the Forty-fifth Congress the same thing occurred. There has been no special effort here to resist proper appropriations for the Department of Agriculture; not at all. If this Department has received any "kick," it has been first when an effort was made to make the head of this little establishment a Cabinet officer. Then he comes here and proposes to this House to decrease the expenses of that Department by allowing the Commissioner of Agriculture to employ persons when he shall see fit and to discharge them when he shall see fit, a proposition to reduce the expenses of the Department of Agriculture, accompanied, however, with a proposition to increase his own salary to $4,000; a proposition, sir, to strike at everybody else, to economize on every other salary in that Department except his own and that of the chief clerk, and on those salaries to make an increase to the extent of 25 per cent. And because we have opposed that proposition the gentleman from New York calls it "kicking" that Department! Now, sir, that is all there is in it.

But the gentleman says the cattle disease is abroad in the land, and that will require extra exertion on the part of the Commissioner of Agriculture. Now, sir, I do not know what he proposes to do in regard to it. The Commissioner will correspond, I presume, with certain parties through his clerks, and next winter, after the cattle disease is all over, this House will be informed of what he has learned through his correspondence. That will be all of it. I hope we will not increase this salary upon any such flimsy reasoning as that which we have heard to-day.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to know of the gentleman from Georgia whether the office of Commissioner of Agriculture is not quite as important to the interests of this country as the office of Commissioner of Pensions. Does he not consider one as important as the other?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not.

Mr. STEELE. Is not the office of Commissioner of Agriculture of quite as much importance to the great agricultural people of this country as the Patent Office?

Mr. BLOUNT. The agricultural people of this country, thank God, are not dependent upon this little retail seed-store for its poor flower and other seeds. They go to first-class seed growers and to the great merchants of the country rather than to this bureau, and experience has demonstrated they are wise in so doing.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Chairman, in reply to something that has fallen from the gentleman from Georgia, I desire to say a word. I tell that gentleman, and I call the attention of the House to the fact, that this increase of salary is necessary because of the increase of work in that Department. The importance of the office is increasing every year, and therefore, in my judgment, and I trust it will be the judgment of this House, it is nothing but just and right to increase this salary—that it will be put at the same amount of the other Commissioners under the Government; for, sir, the Commissioner of the Land Office, the Commissioner of Customs, the Commissioner of Pensions, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs all draw $4,000 a year. The Commissioner of Patents gets $4,500, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue $6,000. Now I cannot for my life understand why the Commissioner of Agriculture should not get as much as any of these other Commissioners.

I call the attention of the House to another fact. When the Department of Agriculture was established as it is to-day, the Commissioner was entitled, by usage if not by law, to the use of a house, and he lived with his family entirely in the Agricultural Bureau. He paid no house rent, and therefore saved at least a thousand dollars a year. Now the Commissioner is not allowed to do that; he has to hire his house. I say no man of the efficiency and ability required to make that Department grow to what it should be, and not the little retail seed store the gentleman from Georgia says it is—I say the man with the ability and the efficiency to make that Department what it should be cannot live here for the small salary now allowed him.

Now, sir, if after this discussion the chairman of this Committee of the Whole be of the opinion, from the information he has received from the gentleman from Tennessee, that my amendment is against existing law, and that he would have so ruled if he had received the information in time—if that be the decision of the Chair, as I understand it is, then I will submit and by unanimous consent withdraw my amendment.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well, and now let the Clerk read on.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase and propagation and distribution, as required by law, of seeds, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and expense of putting up the same, $65,000: And provided further, That the Commissioner shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Commissioner of Agriculture from sending flower, garden, and other seeds to those who apply for the same.

Mr. WHITE. I move in line 1910 after the word "dollars" to insert the following:

A reasonable proportion of which seeds, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall be supplied for distribution among the agricultural constituency of Members of Congress and Delegates when requested.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. It has been the experience no doubt of every member acquainted with the former practice of the distribution of these seeds that it is accompanied with a great deal of trouble, with little profit, and more dissatisfaction on the part of those who do not get the seeds. One of the reasons assigned by the Commissioner for the present practice of sending to those who apply for seeds is the desire on the part of the members of Congress to get rid of the trouble of this distribution.

Mr. WHITE. I ask an opportunity to explain my amendment.

Mr. VANCE. We cannot hear what is going on.

Mr. WHITE. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. REAGAN. I think that amendment is subject to the point of order, and, if so, I make it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas having discussed the merits of the measure cannot raise the question of order.

Mr. REAGAN. The members of this House, when they desire to get these seeds for their constituents, find it a trouble and vexation to distribute them. They get a list of names and send them out to agriculturists, horticulturists, mechanics, artisans, doctors, lawyers; and one-half the persons who get them make no valuable use of them. The Commissioner of Agriculture, under the present plan for the distribution of seeds, has his correspondents in the different counties and communities all over the country, and he furnishes to those correspondents the seeds for distribution to those who will make profitable use of them and report the results of their experiments in relation to them.

Besides that, the constituents of members who think enough of these seeds to ask for them through their members can get them from the Department by the members referring the letters and requests they receive to the Department as they get them. In this way the seeds which go out go to persons who actually request them, or to lists of names furnished by correspondents of the Agricultural Bureau of those who will use the seeds practically and usefully. This is a better and more intelligent use of the seeds, and better calculated to promote improvement in the qualities of the various products raised from these seeds than the plan of distributing them through members of Congress. And while it is better for the interests of the country, it saves members of Congress from being a sort of seed-brokers and occupying the time in franking little packages of seeds to numbers of people over the country that ought to be devoted to the consideration of the great questions which come before Congress.

Mr. VANCE. I ask the gentleman if he proposes that the Commissioner of Agriculture shall furnish seeds to all who want them?

Mr. REAGAN. I propose to require that the Commissioner shall distribute the seeds to those who want them, according to his best discretion, so far as the supply will go; and when members get requests from their constituents they can send those to the Department. Thus the people who want seeds will get them.

Mr. O'NEILL. But they do not get them. Their requests are constantly refused. I have had a number of applications which have been referred to the Department where the seeds have not been sent.

Mr. REAGAN. The Commissioner may refuse the seeds to the gentleman from Philadelphia because they do not plant seeds in the cities.

Mr. WHITE. Is there a point of order pending, or are we discussing the merits of the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order is made against the amendment.

Mr. WHITE. The House will observe that this amendment makes a specific rule upon the subject of the distribution of seeds. As the law now stands we are at sea. We do not know where we are. I hold in my hand, but cannot read in the limited time which I have to address the committee, the law on this subject. It is found in section 527 of the Revised Statutes, to be read in connection with section 526.

Now, a certain policy has obtained in the Government in respect to the distribution of these seeds, and the people of the country understand it. They have been indulged for a few years in having all their reasonable requests for rare seeds, if you please, gratified through their Representatives on this floor. It was so last session without stint; and I think there was reasonable satisfaction given to the country by the way in which the system operated.

Now, however, we encounter when a request is made for a peculiar kind of seed—and in saying this I am not reflecting on anybody—the response that they cannot supply members of Congress; that the law will not allow it, and that there is no seed there for distribution. As the matter stands now I will say, without reflecting at all on the integrity of the administration of that office, we do not know where these seeds go. The intention of the framers of the law creating this Department was to distribute rare and useful seeds among the agricultural population of the United States. We do not know that this distribution is made. I represent a large agricultural population. I receive continual requests for a share of this distribution. I do not know whether I get it or not. Some of my requests are filled; some are not filled. This system subjects the member to criticism, as having neglected his constituency. And the law as it stands now gives us no means of ascertaining whether the distribution is fair or is not fair. This amendment changes the law in that respect, and if there is not a fair distribution the constituency of every Representative can hold the Representative responsible for a neglect in that respect.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] talked about turning members of Congress into seed-brokers. Now, I submit with all fairness to that gentleman, who is broad and liberal in his views generally, that that is an unfair and improper criticism. I hold it to be the duty of members of Congress to observe and respect the reasonable requests of their constituents. I submit that it is nothing but fair that a member of Congress should give some of his time to supply his constituents with such vines, such seeds, and such shrubs as they may request. If you adopt this amendment you will have some rule to go by on this subject; if not, you have no rule whatever.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. I do not like this amendment, Mr. Chairman, for the simple reason that, in my judgment, members will find that their constituents, if it should be adopted, will be more poorly supplied than they are now. My experience has been, during the last Congress, that I was able to supply a much larger number of constituents under the ruling and practice of the Commissioner than I could do if he gave me the seeds. I send him a list or forward letters I receive, and in every case, so far as I have ever heard, he writes a letter accompanying the seeds ordered, saying I have directed them to be sent. Now, sir, the Commissioner can distribute them better than I can. He has the employés there, and gives to a greater number than I can, unless I could divide and subdivide the packages furnished, which would require a great deal of labor which I could not do as well as it is done in the Department. And in no case has the Commissioner refused, to my knowledge, to send seeds except where the supply was exhausted.

Mr. WHITE. Allow me a moment. This amendment of mine does not interfere with that. It requires the Commissioner, on the request of Members, to supply seeds. It does not alter the rule in that respect.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. If the gentleman will excuse me I will say that this same clause provides for the sending out of seeds which he will do as he has been doing if he be let alone.

Mr. SIMONTON. I wish to offer the following amendment:

Insert in line 1912, after the word "purchase," the following:
And shall also report the quantity of seeds, trees, shrubs, cuttings, and plants distributed, and when and where distributed, giving by counties and States the quantity therein, respectively.

Mr. NEAL. That amendment is not in order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SIMONTON. It is an amendment to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. But there is one amendment pending.

Mr. REAGAN. And when it comes up I shall make the point of order on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMONTON] to offer the amendment hereafter.

Mr. SPEER. I do not think that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] will at all deprive the Commissioner of his right and power to send out seeds, cuttings, and so forth, as he is now sending them out. As I understand the amendment, it simply authorizes him to send out a reasonable amount of these seeds for distribution. Gentlemen can still apply to the Commissioner, if they desire to do so, in the manner pointed out by the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. MARTIN.] If a member prefers to send all of his seeds in that way, the last clause of this section will enable him to do so; but some of us especially desire to send seeds, cuttings, and shrubs to our constituents.

I submit that I know the people of my district better than the Commissioner of Agriculture does, who the people are who will take care of these seeds. I know the people, or some of them, who would take especial pride in receiving seeds of the character sent out by the Commissioner, and I can see no objection whatever to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It will not repeal this clause of the section:

But nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Commissioner of Agriculture from sending flower, garden, and other seeds to those who apply for the same.

It will give us a right to send out a portion of the seeds ourselves, and the Commissioner can also send them to persons who apply for them.

Mr. NEAL. Permit me to say to the gentleman who has just taken his seat that he will find no trouble whatever in having seeds sent by the Commissioner to any person in his district. All he has to do is to make a request in writing of the Commissioner saying: Be kind enough to send seeds to A, B, or C.

Mr. SPEER. I have already made that application to the Commissioner and it has been declined.

Mr. KELLEY. I too have requested that seeds shall be sent to people and it has been declined.

Mr. NEAL. That may be true.

Mr. KELLEY. It is true.

Mr. NEAL. It may be true so far as the gentleman from Pennsylvania is concerned.

Mr. HOUK. It is true in regard to Tennessee also.

Mr. BAILEY. The Commissioner of Agriculture may think that gentlemen representing city districts are not entitled to seeds and that the law does not provide for their being supplied with them.

Mr. HOUK. But I represent an agricultural district.

Mr. NEAL. I must decline to yield further. The Commissioner of Agriculture had a certain sum of money provided for in the last appropriation bill for the distribution of seeds. Those seeds were distributed before the assembling of the present Congress under orders sent by members of the Forty-fifth Congress. I know whereof I affirm. Time and again I have sent to him lists of persons whom I thought would take an interest in the cultivation of these seeds and the propagation of plants and report to him the result thereof, and in every single instance he has filled the order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to state in justice to the Commissioner of Agriculture that his declination to furnish seeds arose from the fact that he did not have them.

Mr. NEAL. In every single instance until within the last few days my orders have been filled. Since that time he has sent me word when I asked for special seeds and cuttings that the supply was exhausted and that he had no money with which to purchase more.

Another thing I wish to say in this connection is, that it seems to me there is a great misapprehension in regard to the duties of this officer in this respect. He is not required to furnish garden-seeds to every person throughout the whole country who wants to plant gardens and raise vegetables and flowers. The Department of Agriculture is an experimental institution to provide cuttings and new seeds and plants and send them to different localities, and ascertain what will be useful in one locality and what in another. If the gentleman from Philadelphia has not received seeds and plants it is because he does not deserve them, not having any agriculturists in his district.

Mr. MILLS. I know there has been a great deal of complaint about the manner in which seeds have been distributed from the Agricultural Department, not only recently, but in each one of the Congresses in which I have served; at least, during the last few years this same sort of discussion has come up. I know that I have myself ordered or requested seeds to be sent from the Agricultural Department, and I think that in every instance I have received a letter from the Commissioner stating that the seeds had been sent. But in a great number of instances I have received letters from the parties to whom I requested seeds to be sent stating that they had never received them.

Mr. CLYMER. That may be the fault of the Post-Office.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, I have heard it said that the Post-Office officials steal the seeds. I do not say that is the case.

Since the democratic party has come into power in Congress nearly every Department of the Government has had an overhauling. I think before we adopt any particular rule in regard to the sending of seeds we should have an investigation of this Department. I should dislike very much to have the seeds supplied to members of Congress and to have them required in addition to their other duties to distribute them. But I think the Agricultural Department should be examined into, and if abuses have grown up there they should be made known. In all Departments and bureaus abuses arise. I do not charge them against the party in power more than against any other party. But every Department when it is controlled for a long time by one party is apt to develop corruptions and abuses. I think this Department of Agriculture should be thoroughly investigated and report made to the House as to the manner in which it distributes seeds and cuttings, where it purchases them, what it expends for them; in fact, that a general exhibit should be made of the operations of the Department.

Mr. FORT. I think the trouble about this matter, Mr. Chairman, is with the people. Many people seem to think that it is the business of the Agricultural Department to furnish them not only with garden-seeds but with field-seeds and cuttings and many other things. Instead of going to the seed store in their town or village and purchasing their own garden-seeds, they will write to their Representative to send them an assortment of garden-seeds. They seem to think that it is one of the duties of the Agricultural Department to supply them with what with care and attention they might supply for themselves.

It has been well said here that no seeds should be purchased and distributed by the Agricultural Department except for experimental purposes. In my judgment the Commissioner of Agriculture ought to exercise his discretion as to where and to whom he will send seeds. I have no doubt that some improvement could be made in this matter.

Mr. WILBER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FORT. Very well.

Mr. WILBER. Does the Commissioner of Agriculture understand who, in the gentleman's own district for instance, should be supplied with seeds as well as the gentleman himself understands?

Mr. FORT. Probably not, I will say to the gentleman. I will say further that the Commissioner of Agriculture informed me that he was furnished with a list of names for counties in my district by the sheriffs of the counties. I find that the sheriff of one county furnished him with the names of gentlemen all residing in one little town, not one of whom is an agriculturist.

Mr. WILBER. That is just what I thought.

Mr. FORT. One of them is a fast-horse man. Very few of the leading farmers, especially experimental farmers, are on that list. I will admit that. But the point is that we ought not to furnish these seeds to every one who may ask for them.

Mr. WILBER. I agree with you there.

Mr. FORT. Such seeds should be furnished as in the opinion of the Commissioner of Agriculture may develop some new and valuable variety in some particular soil or climate. I think the whole thing ought to be overhauled and restricted.

Mr. LE FEVRE. I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE,] and upon that point I desire to have read by the Clerk a circular which I send up to the Clerk's desk. I think it will explain to a very great extent the replies that have been sent to gentlemen who have requested the Department to send out the seeds. I ask special attention to this circular.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., 187–.

M —— ——: Your request for seeds, made through Hon. —— ——, is necessarily declined, your section of the country having already been supplied as largely as the resources of the Department would permit. It is to be regretted that the appropriation last year for the purchase and distribution of seeds was wholly inadequate to the constantly increasing demand from every part of the country; and that Congress, in making appropriations for this Department, should fail to recognize the fact that the introduction of new and valuable seeds into the country is of greater importance to the interests and prosperity of the community than are many of the objects upon which the public money is lavishly expended.

Respectfully,

WM. G. LE DUC,
Commissioner.

Mr. LE FEVRE. This circular letter is exceedingly discourteous to members of this House, to characterize it in no severer terms. When we apply for seeds for our constituents, instead of forwarding them as requested, they are informed that the supply is exhausted because we did not appropriate more money for the purchase of the same; that while we have failed to recognize the importance of this great interest we have not failed to recognize interests of much less importance by "lavish" appropriations. That, and that only, is the strong inference.

I further desire to say that I am not willing, so far as I am concerned, when I make an application to the Department of Agriculture for seeds to be sent to a constituent, that that constituent should receive such a circular as this. I would ask whether it is the proper thing for the Commissioner of Agriculture, or any other officer of this Government, to pass criticisms and reflections of this kind upon Congress. It is not for the Commissioner of Agriculture to say whether this Congress makes lavish expenditures and appropriations in other directions or not. Further than that, I think I know the agricultural interests of my district much better than does the Commissioner of Agriculture, and that I am better qualified to furnish them with such seeds as they may require. The Commissioner of Agriculture says the law will not permit him to furnish seeds to members of Congress to be distributed through them to their constituents. Clearly, then, from the tenor of this circular, he does not distribute them himself. What, then, has become of the seeds for the purchase of which the liberal appropriation was made last year—an appropriation as liberal as the average preceding years? The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] struck the key-note when he suggested an investigation of this Department—an investigation that shall show its internal workings, its expenditures, whether extravagant or economical, and whether in a direction to develop and advance the great interests of agriculture. And this investigation should go still further, and determine whether its present chief officer has the confidence of the agriculturists of the country; for if he does not have, all the appropriations this Congress can heap upon him will not tend to advance the great interests he is supposed to represent.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I do not represent an agricultural community. I have been requested, however, to say something in behalf of this bureau. I know that there are complaints made against the bureau by gentlemen like my friend from Georgia; and I have heard of other complaints. A great many of these seeds, it is urged, never reach their destination; and a great many when they reach their destination never produce. I think it very likely that the parable of the sower——

Mr. BAILEY. There is so much confusion in the Hall that we on this side cannot hear our agricultural friend. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I was about to make an exegetical discourse upon the Bible for the benefit of some of our pious friends on this side of the Chamber, though I do not mean to intimate that piety is limited to either side. I was about to read from the parable of the sower to illustrate my remarks about the Agricultural Bureau:

Behold, a sower went forth to sow;
And when he sowed, some seeds fell by the way-side, and the fowls came and devoured them up:
Some fell upon stony places, where they had not much earth.

As perhaps in South Carolina or other places. [Laughter.]

And forthwith they sprung up, because they had no deepness of earth:
And when the sun was up, they were scorched; and because they had no root, they withered away.

But there is something further to be said:

And some fell among thorns; and the thorns sprung up, and choked them.

New England is suggested to me. I do not see the application myself.

But others fell into good ground, and brought forth fruit, some a hundred-fold, some sixty-fold, some thirty-fold.

A MEMBER. That is Iowa.

Another MEMBER. That is Ohio.

Mr. COX. This refers, I presume, to the rich and fruitful West. But we ought not to complain of the Agricultural Bureau because all the seeds distributed by it do not produce. Let us be just to the laborers of the Agricultural Department; and if we do anything to cripple it, let us uproot it altogether as a fungous growth upon our democratic-republican government.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said about members of Congress being "seed peddlers." Now the present arrangement does not relieve members from the trouble of distributing seeds, because they still receive applications from all parts of their districts. I represent nineteen large counties, and I am continually receiving letters from my constituents requesting seeds. I think I can do better in sending out these seeds to my people than the Commissioner of Agriculture can, because I know the farmers; I know who are likely to take pains in planting and cultivating the seeds and reporting the results. I think it best that members should be allowed to send these seeds to those who are to use them.

I know there are complaints that the seeds do not reach those who apply for them; though I do not know where the blame lies. In several instances some of my friends have sent to me for seeds, and the Commissioner of Agriculture has reported that he has sent them; but according to the letters of those who had applied, the seeds were never received. Where those seeds have gone I do not know. I have informed the Commissioner of the matter, and requested him to have it looked into. But I say that those of us who desire to send seeds directly to our constituents ought to have the opportunity. I call upon this House to adopt the pending amendment. I only wish the proposition were a little stronger.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for a vote upon this amendment. If it were allowable for me to do so, I would be willing, so far as I am concerned, to accept it.

The amendment of Mr. WHITE was agreed to.

Mr. SIMONTON. I move to amend by adding after the word "purchase," in line 1912, these words:

And shall also report the quantity of seeds, trees, shrubs, cuttings, and plants distributed; and when and where distributed, giving by counties and States the quantity distributed therein respectively.

Mr. BLOUNT. I reserve a point of order on this amendment, though I have no objection to withholding it till the gentleman has been heard. [A pause.] The gentleman says to me that he desires the point of order stated. The point I make is that this amendment embraces new legislation and does not retrench expenditures as required by the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMONTON] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SIMONTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. The suggestion is made to me that the amendment if adopted would require a large increase of clerical force; but independently of that the proposition does not disclose on its face any reduction of expenditures. Hence it is unnecessary for me to enforce the point of order further.

Mr. SIMONTON. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the point of order is not well taken. I cannot see that the amendment proposes to change existing law in any respect whatever. The statutes now require that the Commissioner of Agriculture shall make a detailed report; and this bill also requires that he shall make a report showing the number of seeds, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, plants, &c., purchased by him, from whom purchased, and at what price. This amendment seeks only to define further this duty.

Now, I submit as a sound principle which ought to be recognized everywhere that a public servant charged with a trust ought to make a report showing how he has discharged that trust. I think this is the duty of this officer under the law. The requirement of the statute now is that he shall make a detailed report, and the bill defines what that report shall show—the moneys expended by him, and also how and where he has made his purchases. My amendment proposes simply to make more specific a duty already devolved upon the Commissioner.

Is it not the duty of a person charged with a public trust to show how he has administered that trust? The sum of $65,000 or $75,000 is now placed in the hands of the Commissioner of Agriculture to be expended for the benefit of the people. He makes the purchases and the distribution; but gentlemen in this Hall do not know how he discharges the trust. They do not know where these things go. Now, I say it is the duty of the Commissioner under the law to make a report of this kind. We ought to know how he discharges this trust. My amendment simply defines in words that which is certainly his duty under the existing law.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to lodge any complaint against the Commissioner of Agriculture, for I have no data upon which to found it; but I do know that when you place seventy-five or one hundred thousand dollars in the hands of any public servant, and allow him to distribute these things as he pleases without making any report of his action in the premises, it furnishes a splendid opportunity for favoritism. I say I do not wish to lodge any complaint against the Commissioner of Agriculture; but I know this, that he is only a human being, and that whenever you invest a man with such power, compelling him to submit no report of his doings or to undergo any examination, it requires more than Spartan virtue to resist the opportunity of practicing favoritism. He ought, in my judgment, to be required to make this report, and we ought to know what he does with this amount of money. It is to be expended for the benefit of the people and not for the favorites of any public officer. I think the point of order is not well taken and that the amendment itself is a meritorious one, and I hope it will receive the favorable consideration of the committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. The speech of the gentleman from Tennessee makes it proper, perhaps, that I should say a few words in addition to what I have already stated concerning this Agricultural Bureau.

The gentleman says the Commissioner of Agriculture ought to make this report in order that the country may understand how this money has been expended, to whom this seed has been sent, and what proportion of distribution there has been among the several States. I submit to that gentleman and to the House that we now have a Committee on Agriculture, whose duty it is to look into that very question, whose habit has been to look into that very question. But the gentleman asked me how could they do that without report. As they have done heretofore, by calling for the books of the Commissioner of Agriculture, which will show in detail the expenditure of the appropriation and to whom seed has been distributed. There is no trouble about finding out these facts. This House can always ascertain, whenever it desires, to whom seeds have been sent. The Commissioner of Agriculture will be, as he always has been, prepared to make to the Committee on Agriculture a complete report of what has been done with the funds voted to him. I know that in the Forty-fourth Congress the Committee on Agriculture did do this identical thing—examined into the distribution of seed and learned all the facts in reference to that distribution.

Mr. SIMONTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMONTON. On the same principle might not the Finance Committee of the House inquire into the management of any other Department of the Government? Why, then, should not the Secretary of State make a report?

Mr. BLOUNT. The Finance Committee has altogether different duties to perform. There is a committee which has charge of the expenditures in other Departments, but none here. It is the duty of the Committee on Agriculture to look into the expenditures under the Commissioner of Agriculture. Beside doing this they have little else to do. There is no law requiring such a report from this Commissioner. The gentleman's amendment would create a law compelling the Commissioner to do that which the law does not now require at his hands. And so far as a report with reference to these expenditures is concerned the chairman will see readily that the additional duties required on the part of the Commissioner of Agriculture will necessarily require an addition to his clerical force. That of course would increase the expense and render the amendment liable to the point of order.

But, sir, in addition to the point of order, I do object to dignifying this little bureau into the position of one of the departments of this Government by having an annual report to Congress the same as from the Treasury Department and other great Departments of the Government. I do object to the design of building it up into a separate department of the Government.

Mr. SIMONTON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. SIMONTON. The gentleman insists that this is new legislation and therefore not in order. Now, has he referred to section 528 of the Revised Statutes, which says that the Commissioner of Agriculture shall annually make a general report in writing of his acts to the President and to Congress; and if so, does not this amendment simply further define what those duties shall be?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. On turning to Rule 120, on which this point of order is made, it will be seen that the word "retrench" is the word used, and not "reduce." I submit with all deference to the Chair and to my friend from Georgia that the tendency of the amendment of my colleague is to retrench expenditures. And how? Because it throws guards and restrictions upon the disbursement of this fund. It requires an account of the mode and manner in which that is done. If the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be required to show to the House in his annual report each year the exact amount of seed which each county and State within the limits of the Union obtains, that at once arrests attention and at once stops, although not the practice under the present Commissioner, a practice which prevailed under former Commissioners, of distributing seed very largely to the residents of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the language of the rule is not "to restrict expenditures," but "shall retrench expenditures."

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I have called the attention of the Chair to the word "retrench" instead of "reduce" expenditures, as I have learned by my experience here that the members of the Committee on Appropriations in raising points of order uniformly confound the word "retrench" with the word "reduce." The rule is to retrench expenditures.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee, if additional labor is required on the part of the Agricultural Department, as it will be by the pending amendment, does not that prima facie compel an increase of clerical force, and therefore an increase of expenditure?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Chairman, that is a begging of the question. This does not require, does not necessarily require, any increase of force, because, as my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. SIMONTON] has already said, if the Commissioner notes the day, notes the time, notes the place and the party from whom purchased, the price, and all that, it is an easy matter, on the corresponding side of the ledger and by the same clerk, to note where it is disbursed and distributed.

One word more. I have to say with regard to the present Commissioner of Agriculture I have no complaint to make against him. I do not believe there is legitimate ground for any complaint to be made against him. I know, and every man on this floor who was a member of the Forty-fifth Congress knows, the demand upon us from our constituents for seeds has increased within the past few years not only twice, but three, four, and five fold. Our country is increasing. Its population, its agricultural, its producing interests generally are increasing; and I, for one, know that this Agricultural Department, ridiculed by my friend from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] has been of immense benefit to the people of this country, even in this matter of the distribution of seeds, thereby adding to the wealth and prosperity of the country.

Mr. ATKINS. I understand that this is a discussion on the point of order. I ask the Chair to confine gentlemen in their remarks to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is sufficiently advised, and is prepared to rule on the point of order, and is only listening to a further discussion at the request of gentlemen occupying the floor.

Mr. WHITE. Before the Chair makes his decision I wish to make a remark to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE.] I wish to assure that gentleman that in offering the amendment I did I had no intention to make any reflection whatever on the present Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I did not so understand.

Mr. WHITE. My idea was to get a rule which would be an aid to the Commissioner in the discharge of his duties.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think it is at all necessary it should be shown that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMONTON] retrenches expenditures, because the Chair does not believe or hold that it changes existing law. It simply undertakes to define and make specific a duty imposed by law. The Chair therefore has no hesitation in ruling the amendment in order.

The question being taken on Mr. SIMONTON's amendment, there were—ayes 35, noes 37.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. BLOUNT, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. SIMONTON.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 52.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 1915 insert the following:

The Commissioner of Agriculture shall, by printed circulars to be sent out with or attached to packages, inform the people that seeds are to be distributed only to persons who will experiment therewith and report the results.

Mr. FORT. I do not think it necessary to discuss the amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SAMFORD. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1912 insert the following:

With a further statement showing from whom the same are purchased, how much purchased, and the value in each case.

Mr. ATKINS. I would suggest to the gentleman that he should allow that to come in at the conclusion of the amendment which has just been adopted on the motion of my colleague, [Mr. SIMONTON.]

Mr. SAMFORD. Very well. I suppose there will be no objection to this amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask if the amendment of my colleague does not come in after the word "purchased," in line 1912?

The CHAIRMAN. It does.

Mr. ATKINS. Then the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] ought to come in after that.

The question being taken on Mr. SAMFORD'S amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. AIKEN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out from line 1907 to line 1915, inclusive, these words:

For purchase and propagation and distribution, as required by law, of seeds, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and expense of putting up the same, $65,000: And provided further, That the Commissioner shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Commissioner of Agriculture from sending flower, garden, and other seeds to those who apply for the same.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

For the purchase and propagation, as required by law, of seeds, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, $70,000. For parceling, packing, and distributing the same, $30,000: Provided further, That the Commissioner shall be required, and he is hereby instructed, to accompany his next annual estimate of the expenses of the Department of Agriculture with an itemized report of the quantity of seeds and plants purchased during the fiscal year for which this appropriation is made, the date of such purchases, the prices paid, and from whom said seeds and plants were purchased.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would ask the gentleman from South Carolina if that is not the existing law now; if this does not provide for the Commissioner making precisely the same report as he would be compelled to make under existing law?

Mr. AIKEN. The wording is a little different and this amendment is somewhat more exacting upon the Commissioner than the existing law is.

As a member of the Committee on Agriculture of the Forty-fifth Congress I desire to make a statement, and ask the attention of the House to it. When this portion of the bill was under discussion in the third session of the Forty-fifth Congress no amendments were offered to it because the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture stated there had been a request for a meeting of the two Committees on Agriculture of the House and the Senate to consider what amendments should be offered, and requested that the bill should be allowed to go to the Senate, and that amendments should be made there. At his request, therefore, this portion of the bill was informally passed over.

I protested against that action privately, and I never learned that the Committee on Agriculture of the House was invited to meet the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate. We never did have our meeting. I went to the members of the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate and urged them to make an amendment similar to this. They declined to do so, I suppose, because it did not come from the Committee on Agriculture of the House. I stated that the Committee on Agriculture of the House had never been invited to meet them, and therefore there had been no meeting of the two committees. I presented a paragraph similar to this at a subsequent meeting of the Committee on Agriculture of the House, and it met with a unanimous approval. There was not a single member who opposed it. The bill came back from the Senate, however, with $65,000 appropriated; $10,000 less than in any previous Congress for the last eight years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I discovered that one objection that had been urged by the Committee on Appropriations in the Forty-fifth Congress to the appropriations annually made for the Agricultural Department was that it required too much money to make the distribution, and the original bill (which we are now considering) had a provision in it that only $7,000 should be appropriated for the distribution of seeds, and that was to be taken out of the $65,000 appropriated for both purchase and distribution. That surprised me, because it was evident that the Committee on Appropriations had never investigated the process of distributing these seeds from the Department. I could take the seventy-five thousand dollars' worth of seeds and distribute them for $1,000, but just in proportion to the expense of distribution are we to infer that they have been minutely distributed among the people of the whole country.

For instance, if the Commissioner were to distribute ten thousand bushels of one kind of seed in four-pound packages, they might go to ten thousand people at a certain expense; but if he were to send the ten thousand bushels to fifty thousand people in less than pound packages, of course it would take five times the labor and cost the Government considerably more money.

Now, a personal examination of the books of the Agricultural Department, which, I dare say, not a single member of the Committee on Appropriations has ever made, informed me that during the past year the Commissioner of Agriculture distributed one million five hundred thousand packages from that Department; and when he reported to the Committee on Appropriations that it required $28,000 to do it, they simply held up their hands in holy horror. But, as I said before, it was evident to my mind that he had distributed them minutely, and that they had gone into every portion of this great country.

Mr. ATKINS. If they have gone into every portion of this great country, what is the use of increasing this appropriation? The gentleman, it seems to me, defeats his own amendment by his last remark. If they have gone into every portion of the country minutely what is the use of having any more?

Now, I do not profess to be as familiar with the Agricultural Department as the gentleman from South Carolina, but the gentleman says that he dares to say that no member of the Committee on Appropriations in the Forty-fifth Congress ever looked into the books of that Department. I beg the gentleman's pardon; there was one member that did look into them, and I happen to be that member. Whether any other member of the Committee on Appropriations did I am not prepared to say, but it is a little singular that the gentleman from South Carolina should come forward now and propose an appropriation of $30,000, which is $25,000 over and above the estimate made by the Commissioner himself.

Here is the estimate; I hold it in my hands; it is $75,000 for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of seeds. The gentleman's amendment, as I understand it, proposes to make an appropriation of the round sum of $100,000.

Now, has the gentleman a letter from the Commissioner of Agriculture asking for this appropriation? Has the Speaker of the House laid before this House any letter of that kind? Is there a letter of that kind in existence? Yet the gentleman comes forward and offers this amendment. Perhaps the Commissioner has told him that he would like to have that amount. That may be so. I have no doubt that the Commissioner would like to have a million dollars, so far as that is concerned. I have no idea that he would at all object if we were to appropriate a million dollars. He seems to think that we had better appropriate larger sums for the distribution of seeds, than to make other lavish expenditures which he charges the Congress of the United States with having made. He sets himself up as a censor upon the action of Congress, and charges Congress with making lavish expenditures and that they ought to have made greater appropriations for the distribution of seeds, and cut off those lavish expenditures. Now, I trust, sir, that, as the Commissioner himself only asks for $75,000, this House at this extra session, when we have no committees to investigate this subject, will decline to take the action which the gentleman from South Carolina requests the House to take.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina, obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. AIKEN.

Mr. AIKEN. It is evident to the House and to those who have listened to the debate since we have taken up this portion of the bill, that every objection urged against the Department is urged against the man who fills the place of Commissioner. Now, I do not regard the Commissioner in this discussion. If he does not do his duty let him be impeached. But I look above him and beyond him to the great agricultural wants of the country, and I say that $75,000 for the distribution of seeds is a mere pittance, and I here predict that in less than four years it will be multiplied five times by the demands of the agriculturists all over this land.

The agriculturists never had a hearing on this floor; they never have had due consideration here. We sit here day after day splitting hairs upon questions of law, and discussing the question whether this or that measure will revolutionize or shoot the Government to death, and we have lavished money, as the Commissioner says, upon a great many questions that are theoretical, and which are of no use—a great disadvantage to the country. We appropriate money for destruction, and not a cent for production.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. AIKEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. Did the gentleman ever call the attention of the Forty-fifth Congress to the lavish expenditures which he charges were made, and ask to have them corrected?

Mr. AIKEN. I never dared to because if I attempted it some such gentleman as the gentleman from Georgia would eternally jump up in front of me before I could get a chance. [Great laughter.] Everybody knows that the business of this House is run by a coterie who sit down in front there on three or four rows of the seats. [Renewed laughter.] But I have a pretty good voice and am generally heard when I attempt to speak, and I intend to be heard in the interest of the agriculturists. I represent an agricultural community; it is a productive community, and we want to enrich this country.

I must confess that I am disgusted to hear men get up here, eminent lawyers and statesmen, and talk about revolution and all that sort of stuff, when we should devote our time to legislating for the benefit of the people and do something to enable them to keep want from their doors. Let us do something to show them that the Government is willing to lend a helping hand to the agricultural interests of the land.

It has never been the purpose of the Agricultural Department, from its establishment until the present time, to send seeds to any and everybody through their congressional representatives. Why, sir, it is the most pitiful specimen of electioneering that I ever heard of. Gentlemen advocate a measure directing the Commissioner to send seeds to Representatives on this floor—for what? To buy votes? I cannot see what else.

The purpose of the present Commissioner of Agriculture is to elevate the Agricultural Department, to increase the productive capacity of our land, to purchase seeds and plants that he knows are prolific and useful, and distribute them to men who will make them more prolific, and in that way to aid that great interest in this country. And $100,000 is a contemptible amount for a purpose so valuable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOWE. I will yield my time to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. AIKEN.]

Mr. ATKINS. I object to that, and call for a vote.

Mr. AIKEN. I am willing that there shall be a vote.

Mr. WHITE. I do not think the committee understand that if this proposition prevails it will strike out entirely that which the committee has just inserted.

Mr. ATKINS. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WHITE. Very well; I merely wanted to call the attention of the House to what will be the effect of this amendment.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. AIKEN; and upon a division there were—ayes 90, noes 33.

Mr. ATKINS. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. AIKEN and Mr. ATKINS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 100.

Mr. ATKINS, (one of the tellers.) I do not call for a further count, but will give notice that I shall call for a separate vote in the House.

So the amendment of Mr. AIKEN was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. I move to amend by inserting after the amendment just adopted that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A reasonable proportion of which seeds shall be supplied, for distribution among their agricultural constituencies, to members of Congress, when requested.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would suggest to the gentleman to modify his amendment by inserting the words "and equal" before "proportion."

Mr. WHITE. I accept that amendment.

Mr. BENNETT. I would suggest that the word "Delegates" should be inserted.

Mr. WHITE. I trust the Delegate from Dakota [Mr. BENNETT] will not ask for that. I understand that the words "members of Congress" will include Delegates.

Mr. BENNETT. I understand there is a doubt about that.

Mr. WHITE. Very well, I will modify the amendment by inserting the word "Delegates."

Mr. ATKINS. Let the amendment be amended so as to require the Commissioner to make report as to the quantity of seeds purchased, from whom purchased, the kinds of seeds, and the value.

Mr. WHITE. That is embraced in the amendment just adopted on motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. AIKEN.]

Mr. ATKINS. I do not think so. I would like to have that read again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] which has been adopted, and the amendment now moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE.]

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. AIKEN, as follows:

For the purchase and propagation, as required by law, of seeds, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, $70,000; for parceling, packing, and distributing the same, $30,000: Provided, further, That the Commissioner shall be required and he is hereby instructed to accompany his next annual estimate of the expenses of the Department of Agriculture with an itemized report of the quantity of seeds and plants purchased during the fiscal year for which this appropriation is made, the dates of said purchases, the prices paid, and from whom the said seeds and plants were purchased.

Mr. WHITE. That covers what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] desires. Now let my amendment be read as it has been modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

A reasonable and equal proportion of which seeds shall be supplied for distribution among their agricultural constituencies to Members and Delegates of Congress, when requested.

Mr. McCOOK. I ask the gentleman to strike out the word "agricultural." There is no reason why we in the city should not have the same amount furnished us. The gentleman should make no distinction between the several constituencies in the country.

Mr. WHITE. This is intended for persons engaged in agricultural pursuits.

Mr. O'NEILL. Any one who owns a farm or cultivates a garden is an agriculturist. This amendment will cover those who live in cities and do that.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend the amendment by substituting the following:

Provided, That the trees, shrubs, cuttings, vines, &c., shall be equally distributed to each congressional district.

Mr. FORT. That amendment might cut out Senators. I suppose the gentleman does not want to do that.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not.

Mr. FORT. Then I would suggest that the gentleman insert the word "Senators."

Mr. WHITE. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not offer that amendment till mine is disposed of.

Mr. ATKINS. I withdraw the amendment for the present.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WHITE, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 103, noes 15.

Mr. ATKINS. I now move to amend by adding after the amendment just adopted the words "and to whom distributed and in what quantities." Unless some report of this kind be required there will be no check upon the Commissioner of Agriculture as to the distribution of these seeds.

Mr. AIKEN. I think this amendment is entirely right.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to call attention to the fact that by requiring a report of this kind we are providing for an amount of labor which the bureau has no adequate force to perform. The language of this amendment would require a report of every package of seeds sent out, to whom sent, and where. Such a report would fill many volumes.

Mr. ATKINS. This information is already on the books of the Commissioner; no additional force will be required.

Mr. REAGAN. I think it will be found that to comply with the requirements in these amendments large additions to the clerical force of the bureau will be necessary; and a very largely increased expense will be incurred for printing which is utterly useless. I regret very much to see the disposition of the House to create a necessity for a useless and expensive increase of clerical force in this bureau.

The amendment was agreed to; there being—ayes 82, noes 19.

Mr. SAMFORD. I move to amend by adding at the end of the pending paragraph the following:

Provided, That no part of said sum shall be paid to salaried employés in said Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing and completing the investigation into the history and habits of insects injurious to the cotton-plant, and other insects injurious to agriculture, and for necessary salary, contingent and traveling expenses of investigators employed in such duty, $5,000.

Mr. HASKELL. I move to strike out this paragraph for the purpose of moving hereafter that it be inserted under the head of the United States entomological commission. My object is that the money appropriated in the paragraph may be expended under the direction of that commission—a body already in existence, having at its head Professor Riley. This commission has already made a report upon grasshoppers and other insects of the West. We are all desirous to have that work concluded, as also an investigation into the ravages of the cotton-plant worm. It is deemed best that the Department of Agriculture, which has a division of entomology, should be left to continue its ordinary work, and that this special work of investigating the cotton-plant worm and completing the investigation of the Rocky Mountain locust should be made by the entomological commission, presided over by Professor Riley—a commission well known all over the United States as a wise body, whose members have been selected with special reference to their qualifications for this class of work.

Mr. ATKINS. Do I understand that the gentleman proposes merely a transposition of this paragraph?

Mr. HASKELL. That is all. My amendment adds not a dollar to the appropriation and make no changes in the law. It simply proposes to put this money into the hands of a commission, already in existence, that has done good work. I believe the proposition will commend itself to the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GODSHALK. I move to amend by striking out "5" in line 1931, and inserting "6," so as to make the appropriation $6,000 instead of $5,000, for investigating the history and habits of insects injurious to agriculture, &c.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay salaries and traveling and other necessary expenses of inspectors at the different shipping ports of the United States and elsewhere, and for controlling or eradicating infectious and contagious diseases among domesticated animals, $25,000; to be immediately available.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to amend by striking out "$25,000" and inserting "$250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. BLOUNT. I reserve a question of order on this amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the Committee of the Whole will not be alarmed at the amount named in my amendment. If I can get the attention of the committee I think I can demonstrate that the making of this appropriation will be in the line of economy. This increased appropriation is aimed at the eradication and stamping out of the disease among cattle known as "pleuro-pneumonia," a disease which has proved most disastrous in every country in which it has appeared. I wish to give to this committee some information that I have on this subject, and I will state in advance that this amendment is offered at the request of the Legislature of my own State, as will appear by the following:

Joint resolutions instructing Senators and requesting Representatives in Congress from Virginia to stamp out and prevent the spread of cattle diseases in the United States.

1. Resolved by the General Assembly, That the Senators in Congress from Virginia be, and they are hereby, instructed, and the Representatives are requested, to use their best endeavors to procure the prompt passage, by Congress, of such laws as will effectually stamp out or prevent the spread of the disease now existing to a limited extent in certain sections of the United States, and known as "pleuro-pneumonia," or any disease which prevents the importation of cattle into the United Kingdom of Great Britain, or any part thereof; and in view of the importance of the matter, our Senators and Representatives are hereby urged to move at once.

2. That the governor be, and he is hereby, requested to forward a copy of these resolutions to each Senator and Representative from Virginia in Congress.

This disease is unknown in the United States except where it has been imported from abroad. It comes mainly from Germany. It has appeared in six States and in the District of Columbia. It made its appearance some years ago in Great Britain; and I have before me a report made by Professor James Law, of Cornell University, New York, stating that the first twenty-five years of the existence of the disease in the Kingdom of Great Britain cost that country in the death of cattle alone $450,000,000—an annual cost to the people of nearly $20,000,000.

The disease first appeared on this continent in the State of Massachusetts, in 1859, and it originated there by the introduction of imported breeds of cattle from Germany. The Legislature of Massachusetts in that year passed a law directing the governor to stamp out the disease in that State without regard to cost. By vigorous action that State was cleared of the disease at that time, and according to my information it has not since appeared there. It exists to-day in New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia; and when this disease shall have spread from the eastern side of the Alleghanies to the great cattle plains of the West, the amount of damage done to the people of the United States annually can only be estimated by millions upon millions of dollars, because we know if the cattle which come from the West to the East are infected with this disease the loss to the owners and the grazers of these cattle will be incalculable. At present the disease exists in very few and very small localities. It exists in two counties of Pennsylvania, a small portion of the State of New York, a small portion of the State of Maryland, in the District of Columbia, and in two spots in the State of Virginia. Around the city of Alexandria, extending a mile or two into the country, this disease exists, carried from the District of Columbia, and carried to the District of Columbia from Maryland, and to Maryland from farther north.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HUNTON. I trust I may be allowed to proceed.

Mr. BRIGHT. I take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HUNTON. I thank the gentleman. Now, Mr. Chairman, this disease is at present confined to milch-cows, and while the drain of cattle is from the West to the East there are occasional instances in which cattle are carried from the East to the West, because we know that improved breeds of cattle are bought in the East and carried to the West to improve the breeds of cattle now there. When it shall occur that diseased cattle of this character are carried to the West and this disease breaks out upon the plains of the West, from which we draw our supplies of cattle, the cattle business will be broken up and destroyed in this country. If any gentleman upon this floor can estimate or begin to estimate the damage which will be done to this country arising from the general prevalence of pleuro-pneumonia among the cattle of the country he is a better arithmetician than I am.

Another great trouble in this matter is that the very moment it got abroad that this disease existed in the United States, England prohibited the importation of live cattle from the United States into that kingdom. That destroyed at one blow one of the best and most improving trades in the United States, because the exportation of the cattle from the United States to Great Britain in the last twelve months amounted to nearly $30,000,000, and was increasing weekly until it was stopped by the prevalence of this report that we had pleuro-pneumonia in our midst. This is a matter of so much importance that it has engaged the attention of this Government. Cabinet meetings have been held to consider what steps should be taken to induce the Kingdom of Great Britain to reopen this cattle trade with the United States.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HUNTON. With great pleasure.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman to state specifically, if he can well do so, how he proposes to use this fund.

Mr. HUNTON. Certainly, it is a very legitimate question. The only way known to eradicate this disease, the only practicable and efficient mode that has ever been tried, is by stamping it out by buying and killing the cattle having the disease. That is a question most scientifically treated by Professor Law in a report which I should like to lay before this committee if time allowed. That was the mode adopted by the State of Massachusetts when it got rid of this disease in 1859. It is the course pursued in Pennsylvania and New York to get rid of the disease in those States. A few years ago, I have forgotten the date, a sum of $10,000 was appropriated by the State of New York to eradicate this disease. It was found insufficient, and the commissioners without regard to the amount appropriated spent double that amount and patriotic citizens of the State contributed $20,000 more.

I mention these facts, Mr. Chairman, to show the alarm of great danger to the whole country from the spread of this disease. I desire to have read for the information of the committee a report made to the governor of Virginia by one of the most intelligent farmers in that State on this subject.

THE PLAINS, VIRGINIA, April 1, 1879.

DEAR SIR: Your letter covering a communication from the Commissioner of Agriculture of the United States, on the subject of pleuro-pneumonia in the cattle in Virginia, was duly received, and I at once went to Alexandria and Fairfax County and spent three days making examination into the condition of the cattle in that section, and find that there is a good deal of the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia among the dairy cows in and around Alexandria, and for four miles out from the town, in Fairfax County, and extending about ten miles up and down the river south of Washington and Alexandria. That the disease is contagious or infectious and that it is spreading slowly South and West, there is no doubt, and should by all means be stopped at once. I do not see that it is in the power of the State authorities to stop it, because though it might be stamped out in its now small proportions in Virginia by killing and paying for all infected animals, or those that have come within the reach of the contagion, yet, as the disease is prevailing to a greater extent in Washington City and Maryland, from whence we got it, it would be brought over to us again in a few weeks, and as we cannot interfere with commerce (the trade in cattle) between the States, we would have it all to go over again and again, ad infinitum, and thus further impoverish our State. Therefore I recommend that every proper means be used to get the National Government through their Congress, now in extra session, to make an appropriation of not less than $500,000, to be placed at the disposal of the Commissioner of Agriculture, for this especial purpose; and thus by the most vigorous and prompt means stamp out this most dreadful disease while it is now in comparatively small proportions. This disease is now confined to the New England and Middle States, east of the Alleghany Mountains; if not at once stopped, in less than three years it will get out on the Western plains and $50,000,000 per annum will be a small estimate of the loss to the United States. I cannot too earnestly recommend that every means be used to get the National Government to take hold of this important subject. It is not possibly in the power of the States to stop this disease entirely.

Very respectfully,

ROBT. BEVERLEY.

To his Excellency, F. M. HOLLIDAY,
Governor of Virginia.

Mr. SPARKS. The letter which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] has just had read at the Clerk's desk expresses the fear that is being felt throughout the country on this subject. The people in the West engaged in the business of cattle-raising have already become cognizant of the prevalence in certain localities of this terrible disease, and are greatly excited over it.

I rose, however, mainly to state my hearty concurrence in the views expressed by the gentleman from Virginia on this subject. I have had some letters on the subject from my constituents, giving expression to much feeling and anxiety in relation to it. The ruinous effects of the ravages of that disease should it spread West into the great cattle-raising regions of this country can be counted only by scores of millions of dollars annually.

There is no doubt about its being a matter of vast importance. Hence an appropriation of $25,000, as proposed in the bill, to get rid of the disease is but tantalizing, and would amount to nothing. To do anything effective toward its eradication means must be provided to permanently stamp it out of existence, as suggested by the gentleman from Virginia; and to stamp it out you must get hold of these diseased cattle and destroy them. There is no other remedy. What is wanted is not experimenting with remedies to cure this disease. To cure it by any medical remedies that can be resorted to will, in my judgment, be found to be impossible. You can only cure it by killing the animals which have it, and thus stamp it out. It is now, as stated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] confined to a limited extent of country, and by taking hold of the matter now vigorously we can eradicate it. But it requires prompt and vigorous action, and will necessarily, as it strikes me, demand the expenditure of a sum of money fully as large as that mentioned in the proposed amendment.

Why, sir, the simple statement of fact that Great Britain is now moving in the direction of preventing the importation into that country of our cattle shows to the country and to every man who has reflected a moment about it the vast importance of the subject. The trade of that kingdom in this item of food supply is to our country of incalculable benefit. And if they become frightened there and on the continent that our dressed beef or cattle on the hoof, as shipped to them, is infected or suspected of disease, of course that will stop the trade, and of necessity close that excellent market to this important article of our export commerce. I do not know that the Commissioner of Agriculture (as is contemplated by the amendment) is the proper person to regulate this matter. Perhaps it would have been better, and may now be better, to amend so that a specially selected commission be organized to superintend it, or that it be placed under the charge of one of the regular Departments of the Government. Be that, however, as it may, my present purpose is to join my friend from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] in giving expression to my cordial and hearty approval of the movement and urge immediate and effective action in the premises.

Mr. ATKINS. In view of the importance of this proposition as explained by the gentleman from Virginia who offered it, and further illustrated by the gentleman from Illinois, and in view of the fact that action is being taken in the other wing of the Capitol on this question; in view of the fact also that there is other business the House desires to transact this evening, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to allow me to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. You can offer it to-morrow.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

AMERICAN PHILOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask unanimous consent to present and have referred a memorial of the American Philological Association of the United States, signed by its officers and one hundred and thirty members of the association, praying that a commission be appointed by Congress to examine and report how far changes and amendments in the orthography of the English language may be wisely introduced into the public documents and accepted in the examinations for civil service. The signatures attached are those of some of the ablest scholars in the country, and represent Harvard University and fifty other institutions of education.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

ELIZA M. FRICK.

Mr. COFFROTH. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have referred a bill granting a pension to Eliza M. Frick, widow of Clarence M. Frick, a soldier of the Mexican war.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed with the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1951, strike out "twenty-five" and insert in lieu thereof "two hundred and fifty," and after the word "dollars" insert "as much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. Before any further proceeding is taken, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] reserved all points of order upon the amendment, which has not yet been decided.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that no point of order is pending, but the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] gave notice that he reserved the right to make the point of order, and the Chair understands that he withdrew his right to make the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not know how that may be; if the Chair so understands it, of course I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has not made the point of order.

The Clerk read Mr. REAGAN'S amendment, as follows:

Provided, That the said sum, or any part thereof, may be expended by the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules as he may prescribe, and proper vouchers shall be preserved of all such expenditures, and he shall report his action under this law to each regular session of Congress, showing the sum of money expended and for what purpose.

Mr. REAGAN. As the amendment now stands there is no provision inserted for executing it. It is simply an amendment to appropriate this amount of money. We ought to put it under the control of one of the Departments, and that I think should be the one to which the Agricultural Bureau belongs, if it belongs to any Department, so as to make provision for securing proper vouchers and the execution of the law on some fixed plan. This will at least surround the expenditures made with all the safeguards that are necessary for the proper expenditure of the funds.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, and I ask him to accept it as a part of his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order; an amendment in the second degree is already pending, and the gentleman cannot offer a further amendment, unless he offers it as a substitute.

Mr. ATKINS. If I properly understand the amendment, which I think I do, for I have had some conversation with the gentleman from Illinois, I would like to have it read so that the House can understand it, and then the gentleman from Texas may incorporate it in his amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And authority is hereby given to the Secretary of the Interior to prescribe regulations under which cattle afflicted with the disease of pluero-pneumonia may be seized, appraised, and slaughtered, and payment therefor made out of moneys hereby appropriated.

Mr. REAGAN. If I can do so I will accept that as part of my amendment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I would like to make one single remark upon the general subject.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I do not believe I apprehend very fully the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. I would like to have it again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be reported as modified by the acceptance of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That said sum or any portion thereof may be expended by the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules as he may prescribe, and proper vouchers shall be preserved of all such expenditures, and he shall report his action under this law to each regular session of Congress, showing the sum of money expended and for what purpose; and authority is hereby given to the Secretary of the Interior to prescribe regulations under which cattle afflicted with the disease of pleuro-pneumonia may be seized, appraised, and slaughtered, and payment therefor made out of moneys hereby appropriated.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have no doubt that now and then a State, perhaps many of the States, would take care of this question for themselves. But when I reflect upon the number of States, the danger of this disease, and that however well most of the States might act yet if one failed to act all that had been done by the others would go for nothing, it is very important, it seems to me from that stand-point, that we should have this legislation empowering the Secretary of the Interior not only to investigate but to sieze, appraise, and slaughter, wherever found, cattle having this disease.

So far as I am concerned I have no doubt about the authority to enact this legislation and to give this power to the Secretary of the Interior. Perhaps I would not be able to mature rules and regulations myself, hence I have offered the amendment which has just been read as a part of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] giving this power to the Secretary of the Interior to make all proper regulations as experience may dictate.

I agree with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] that no more important matter has come before this House for its consideration; a matter important not only because of the commerce in live cattle which we are now carrying on by shipping them abroad, but important as affecting by hundreds and thousands and millions of dollars the wealth of the people. The probability is that this appropriation of $250,000 would be sufficient to rid the country of this disease.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Ordinarily I do not know that I would have any objection to this amendment. I think this is a very important subject, and the object had in view is a very proper one. It should be remembered, however, that at the recent session of Congress a National Board of Health was created. That board to-day is engaged in the investigation of the very subject embraced in this amendment, and before anything is done in the matter I think we should hear the report of that body.

It seems to me it would be better to allow the Board of Health especially charged with that duty by law to continue their investigation and to suggest such modes and methods of preventing the cattle disease as their investigations may indicate as advisable. It seems to me it would be better to confine that power to the National Board of Health than to give it to the Secretary of the Interior. I have but recently heard distinguished members of this body make labored arguments against the power of the Federal Government to legislate upon the subject of public health in an emergency when thousands of human lives may be at stake, and yet I find some of these same gentlemen to-day sitting in silence and urging no protest against this extraordinary proposition, while others of them are its active advocates. Do these gentlemen value the health of cattle higher than the lives of human beings? and do they understand that this proposed amendment confers greater powers upon one single individual than was proposed to be given to the whole National Board of Public Health under the bill which they succeeded in defeating at the last session of Congress?

Mr. AIKEN. I desire to ask the gentleman who offered this amendment to explain to this House why it is that he desires to have this appropriation go to the Internal Revenue Department, or something of that kind; back here we cannot understand very distinctly where it is to go. I only understand that it is intended to take it out of the hands of the Commissioner of Agriculture. I would inquire why that is done?

Mr. REAGAN. The reason for suggesting the Secretary of the Interior was that he now has the machinery for preserving the vouchers and keeping the accounts of the expenditure of this money. In addition to that, being a Cabinet officer, he can, if need be, have consultation with and the advice of the Cabinet as to the action he should take. In that respect he is in a better condition to prepare the instructions contemplated for the execution of the law than probably a bureau officer would be who would not have equal facilities for the purpose. That was the object I had in view. It was not from any distrust of the capacity or disposition of the Commissioner of Agriculture to discharge this duty. The Secretary of the Interior was named because of the facts to which I have referred. He has the means of keeping the accounts and preserving the vouchers, and can have the advice of all the Cabinet in the preparation of instructions for the execution of the law.

It is suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. YOUNG,] and has been privately suggested by other gentlemen, that this expenditure should be placed under the direction of the National Board of Health. No doubt the National Board of Health can perform a very valuable service in the position to which they have been assigned; but one of the objections urged to the creation of that board was that it would be directly worked up into a large and expensive bureau of the Government. The first step toward that would be the addition of this duty to their other duties, this duty not having any relation to the others which they are called upon to perform, but would simply give them new and additional powers. And while it would do so they would not have the machinery for keeping the accounts and preserving the vouchers that is already in possession of the Secretary of the Interior; nor would they have the same facilities of information for the preparation of the rules and regulations under which this expenditure should be made. It seems to me, without intending distrust of any other Department or officer that may be suggested to perform this service, that there are manifest reasons why the necessary regulations should be prescribed by the head of a Department and expended under this responsible kind of authority and direction.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, concurring in the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] and some others who have spoken, I think this is a subject of very great importance. It seems to me, however, that this Committee of the Whole will not realize its whole importance if they adopt this measure thus hastily in an appropriation bill.

It was stated yesterday by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] that as far back as fifteen or eighteen years ago the State of Massachusetts stamped out the cattle disease which then prevailed within its borders. So it did. It took hold of the matter through its Legislature, and by efficient laws eradicated the disease utterly, so that in a few years from the time that action was commenced no case of the disease existed within the borders of that Commonwealth. The disease having been transmitted to the State of New Hampshire, that State also, by similar vigorous legislation, arrested and eradicated it within its borders.

Now the fact is stated here that within a circuit of four or five miles around Alexandria, Virginia, there are a few cases of pleuro-pneumonia; and the Legislature of that State has passed a solemn resolution asking Congress to do something to drive the disease from the State. I submit, sir, that while the Legislature of that State was in session it could have found and applied a remedy long ago without asking the interposition of Congress, a matter necessarily involving considerable delay.

Besides, it becomes a very important question—although my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says that he has no doubts about it—whether this Congress will or can arm the Secretary of the Interior with the power to go into the various States of this Union, take up the cattle of private owners, and, under certain rules which he may adopt and promulgate, slaughter and bury those cattle. That is what is proposed here. But I would suggest that this whole question should be carefully considered by some suitable committee of the House, (probably the Committee on Agriculture would be the most appropriate committee to take the subject in charge;) that a report should be made as speedily as possible; and, if deemed advisable and within the power of Congress, that we should enact legislation on the subject. Let a committee of this House prepare a bill which will be properly guarded. If gentlemen will examine the legislation of the State of Massachusetts on this subject it will be found that act after act was passed in order to cover all the cases that might arise. Why? Because at that time there were, as there are now, a great many owners of cattle who said, "this disease is not contagious; the outcry about its being contagious is all humbug." Hence, they resisted the action of the commissioners, as well as of the municipal authorities, until the Legislature, by amendatory acts, established a permanent board of commissioners with absolute authority and control.

Now, as I understand, the Secretary of the Interior under the legislation here proposed, authorizing him to prescribe rules, could only go out and buy the cattle at such price as the owners might fix. He would have no power to isolate cattle, to separate those having the disease from those free from it. He would have no right to take land for the purpose of establishing hospital grounds for diseased cattle; yet this always becomes necessary in the treatment of the disease. Measures of this kind, I maintain, lie within the special province of the States; and it is a very grave question whether the Congress of the United States has full power to deal with this subject efficiently. At all events I submit that we ought not to attempt to deal with it upon an appropriation bill on such hurried debate and consideration as we can give it here.

In these remarks I do not underestimate at all the importance of this subject. Nobody can overrate the influence of the disease upon the trade, the commerce, and the industrial interests of our whole people.

Mr. COVERT. Mr. Chairman, is it in order to offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] as amended on motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON?] If so, I desire to offer a substitute providing that in lieu of the words "Secretary of Interior" in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois the words "Commissioner of Agriculture" be inserted. While supporting this amendment I desire to say one word, and one word only, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] who has just taken his seat.

I quite agree with him, and with other gentlemen who have spoken, with reference to the great importance of this question. I quite agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts that this is a matter proper to be referred in the first instance to the Committee on Agriculture, to be thoroughly digested by them in a bill to be presented for the subsequent action of the House. But the misfortune is that this is an exigency which is suddenly presented to the country and which requires immediate action. The occasion will not brook the delay to which it will necessarily be subjected if we resort to the ordinary machinery of reporting a bill regularly for the action of the House. Immediate action is required; and it seems to me such action ought to be taken.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that the appropriation here proposed will not take effect until the 1st of July next; so that there is ample time.

Mr. COVERT. If the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ATKINS] will look at the language of the provision he will find that it is to take effect immediately. The occasion calling for this appropriation demands immediate action.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COVERT] that there are two amendments already pending, and a further amendment would not at present be in order.

Mr. COVERT. Would it not be in order to offer a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. A substitute would be in order.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I wish to ask the Chair a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the amendment as well as the substitute proposed by the gentleman from New York subject to the point of order as new legislation?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot pass upon the point of order unless the gentleman presents his amendment to the Chair.

Mr. COVERT. I have called the attention of the Chair to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not undertake to rule on the point of order when he has not the amendment in his possession.

Mr. COVERT. I send my amendment to the Clerk's desk. It is, as I have repeated two or three times, to substitute "Commissioner of Agriculture" for "Secretary of the Interior."

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order as a substitute to the pending amendment, but is in the nature of an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COVERT. I wish to state a word in opposition to the amendment, then, Mr. Chairman. Now, the Secretary of the Interior is already, it seems to me, a hard-worked officer. He has under his control and supervision the Land Office, Pension Office, Patent Office, Census Office, Bureau of Education, and the Bureau of Surveys. In the name of ordinary common sense, then, the effort being made to increase the duties of this already overworked official in reference to a matter entirely foreign to his Department is one of those things at this present juncture which I have not been able to determine. This is a matter which belongs exclusively and peculiarly to the Department of Agriculture, and it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the attempt to wrest from that officer jurisdiction over the matter by an amendment to the appropriation bill is an attempt to strike at the Department of Agriculture and take from that Department what should be regarded as its legitimate duties.

Mr. LORING. I desire to say to the committee, Mr. Chairman, that the question involved in the amendment, as I understand it, is an important one so far as the State and national industries of this country are concerned. I had myself the honor of serving on the commission in the State of Massachusetts to which my colleague has alluded, and the history of the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia there will show this House, if the Federal Government had been empowered in the beginning to move, that instead of costing the Commonwealth of Massachusetts $125,000 to remove this disease it would not have cost that Commonwealth one dollar.

The pleuro-pneumonia in 1861–'62 was brought by imported cattle from the herds of Holland and landed in Boston. The cattle when they landed there were in such a condition that they were transported to the farm of the person who bought them on drays. The disease was carried into the State of Massachusetts and planted by that transportation into some of the most valuable dairy districts of that State. The Commonwealth was obliged to move in the business or find one of its most important industries utterly destroyed.

Now, had the Federal Government been in funds and its officers clothed with authority to check that when it landed on the wharves in Boston, the State of Massachusetts would have been saved $125,000, and the farmers of Massachusetts would have been saved incalculable damage. No words can tell the distress that fell upon the agricultural section of that State. For more than two years the whole business was suspended; prosperous farmers were compelled to change their business, and every man who has experience in any way in the agricultural industries of this country knows it is much more difficult for a small farmer to change the line of his traffic than it is for a great manufacturer or merchant to change his.

I am entirely in favor, therefore, of clothing some Federal officers with the right to seize this thing on the threshold and put an end to it whether it is coming through the ports on the seaboard or being transported from the Territories on the other side of this continent. I trust that no consideration either of State authority or of economy, so called, will in any way prevent the officers of this Government from being clothed with authority and supplied with funds to protect the agricultural industries of this Government against the recurrence of a calamity like that which I witnessed myself and which I am happy to say I was instrumental in removing from the Commonwealth which I in part represent here. I trust, therefore, sir, the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HAWLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, everybody agrees with our friend from Massachusetts in the general purpose of his remarks, but it strikes me that he has confounded a little the functions of the State with the functions of the Federal Government. Not to lug in unnecessarily our doctrine of State rights, I concur with the other gentleman from Massachusetts; there are some powers, perhaps, here which could with great difficulty be exercised by Federal officers. When the other gentleman from Massachusetts who has just spoken suggests the stopping of this cattle disease at the threshold, at the port of Boston, he suggests a thing very properly within the duties of a Federal officer. I think, therefore, there is some embarrassment in acting upon this matter in this hasty manner upon an amendment suddenly brought in and offered to an appropriation bill, and, if possible, I suggest the whole question be referred to some capable committee, either to a select committee or to the Committee on Agriculture, to prepare a bill.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Connecticut allow me to state that the National Board of Health has had this very subject under advisement for the last ten days and have prepared a bill covering this whole subject? That bill is now in my desk, and I propose to offer it at the very first opportunity.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am glad to be so informed. I understand the gentleman to say the Board of Health has prepared a bill on this subject. If that bill answers the purpose, very good; if not, let a committee of the House prepare a bill which will place in Federal officers all the powers they require to exercise in stopping the importation of diseased cattle, controlling the exportation of diseased cattle, and regulating interstate commerce.

It would be a very serious calamity if any number of diseased cattle should be taken into the West and convey the disease into the great western country. It would be a calamity beyond our power to measure. The Federal Government can do much at the ports in stopping importation and regulating interstate commerce, but effective work can only be done by State boards as that of Massachusetts or as that in my own State of Connecticut, which has been in the last few months acting on this matter and seizing and condemning cattle. Much of the work has to be left to the States. There is much of the work which they can do. Proceeding in this hasty way I fear we shall fail. We cannot go into the States and seize and condemn and kill cattle. That must be done by State authority. Let us know exactly what we can do as a Federal Government and I believe Congress will be ready to do it.

Mr. WRIGHT obtained the floor.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me one moment? I simply wish to ask the gentleman from Connecticut if he does not know the Committee on Appropriations did consider this matter, and have already provided an appropriation for this purpose? The gentleman from Virginia simply increased that appropriation. The matter has already been considered by the Committee on Appropriations and reported as a part of the bill. The amount is simply increased by the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HAWLEY. But what powers are given?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WRIGHT. If this were a question which it was necessary to refer to a committee for examination, why then it would be proper enough to send it to a committee; but this system of red tape in disposing of an important question like this when fairly before the House, and which leads to postponement and probably to defeat, is not the way to treat the question.

There is not a gentleman upon this floor but will admit, without argument and without further examination, that this question of protecting the cattle of this country against this disease is one of the most important questions that can come before Congress for its consideration. Now, it is not enough to make an appropriation of $25,000 for the purpose of appointing agents to visit the depots of transportation and inquire into the causes of the disease. You require a remedy to be applied; you require measures to be applied that will answer the purpose they are designed for. I agree perfectly with my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LORING] that this is a question that is not to be tampered with. It is one that should be met and disposed of; and it makes no odds what amount it may cost the National Treasury if by a proper expenditure of money this disease can be prevented from extending throughout the country.

I admit when the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] made this proposition yesterday to change the amount of this item from $25,000 to $250,000, it appeared to me an extravagant proposition, a measure that could not meet the approbation of the House. But before the gentleman took his seat he convinced me that if an appropriation of $500,000 was necessary to accomplish the object and to accomplish it effectually, I should have sustained it and voted for it. It will not do where a matter of this magnitude is presented for consideration to refer it to a committee for examination. That means defeat. Suppose it is referred to a committee; that committee cannot report at this special session of Congress, and it goes over to December. This, then, would only be the first step toward the defeat of this great measure which in my judgment is of more importance than any one presented here since we met in this called session.

I am prepared to vote for this amendment in the bill as it is, and if $250,000 is not enough I am willing to vote for $500,000. We cannot afford to sacrifice the great cattle-raising interest of the western country. We cannot afford to stop to consider about it. If the disease shall extend there and become general, it will affect the trade to an immense amount and destroy the prosperity of not merely a single State, but of half a dozen States which rely upon the cattle-trade as one of the chief branches of their industry and commerce.

Now, I hope there will be no effort made to send this matter to a special committee, because you bury it the moment you do that. Take up the matter at once, for it is the interest of all, and dispose of it. It is a matter that needs our consideration, and that consideration must be prompt.

Mr. HUNTON. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LORING,] who last addressed the House, for his contribution to the debate on this subject. It is conceded all over the House that something must be done, and that speedily, in order to stamp out this disease, which, if not arrested, according to the opinion of many intelligent men, will in a few years cost this country more than the late war cost the country in dollars and cents.

I mention this to show the great importance of the question before this committee. I do not care how the work is done, so that it is done effectually and promptly, and it is for the reason that some gentlemen are opposed to putting this appropriation under the control of the Commissioner of Agriculture that I am willing to take the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] or any other that looks to prompt action on this great subject which is now engaging the attention of the committee. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] say that this is a State matter, and that it ought to be attended to by the States and not by the Federal Government. If it were to be undertaken by the States the whole thing would amount to nothing.

Mr. ROBINSON. I confined my remarks on that subject simply to the taking and killing of cattle, and not to the prohibition of the transportation of them.

Mr. HUNTON. I should have come to that in a moment. I will take my own State, where the disease prevails to a very limited extent, and if my State, impoverished as every gentleman knows she is, scarcely able to meet her debts already contracted, if she were able to make an appropriation to stamp this disease, the moment we stopped it, it would come back again from the District of Columbia, where it originated, and therefore it is not in the power of any one State to extirpate the disease from the State, because the moment it is extirpated in Virginia it comes back from the District of Columbia.

Now, there is no State that can act for the District of Columbia, and if there were authority outside of the House to act for the District of Columbia there must be uniform action, harmonious action throughout all the States, or the effort to check this disease would be unavailing.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUNTON. Certainly; although I am very much pressed for time.

Mr. WHITE. In the discussion yesterday the gentleman asserted that this disease existed in Pennsylvania. Now, it is a disputed question whether it exists in two of the eastern counties of Pennsylvania or not. That question is before the Legislature of the State.

Mr. HUNTON. I cannot give up my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make a speech.

Mr. WHITE. I merely wish to remark that our State has taken steps in regard to the disease themselves.

Mr. HUNTON. I stated yesterday that Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey had taken action in this matter.

Mr. WHITE. Would it be wise to do anything to conflict with their action?

Mr. HUNTON. As to whether the disease exists there I have half a dozen communications from the gentleman's State in which it is declared that it does exist there.

Mr. WHITE. Would it be wise in this crude manner to interfere with what the States are doing?

Mr. HUNTON. It will do no harm to the gentleman's State to pass this bill appropriating $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and if it is not necessary in Pennsylvania, in the name of God, let us spend nothing there.

Mr. WHITE. All I want to do is to be practical about it.

Mr. HUNTON. So do I. If I supposed that nothing practical could be done I would not occupy the time of the committee in discussing this question, and that is the reason why I am willing to concur in the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.] I want something done promptly. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] talks about the Board of Health investigating the subject. Why, Mr. Chairman, while the Board of Health is investigating this pleuro-pneumonia in cattle the disease will spread immensely, and while $250,000 may be sufficient now, if you leave it to the board of health it will take $500,000 or $1,000,000 to suppress it.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to modify my amendment by inserting after the word "slaughtered" the words "under the provisions of the laws of the respective States for the condemnation of private property to public use."

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I object to that amendment.

Mr. HILL. I am willing to go as far as any member on this floor to protect the people of the United States against the evil complained of; but I am opposed to establishing the dangerous precedent of requiring the Government of the United States to pay out a quarter of a million of dollars for diseased cattle. It is conceded by the gentleman from Virginia that this class of cattle are infected with a certain disease—or, in other words, that it is a contagious and not an infectious disease; and it is proposed here, without consideration, to establish a precedent by appropriating $250,000 to enable the Government to buy up a lot of diseased cows which it is conceded are going to die anyhow. Why, sir, it would increase the importation of that very class of cattle we desire to get rid of. Who would not go abroad and buy diseased cattle and bring them to this country when there is a pledge from the Government of the United States to take them off his hands as soon as they are sick? Any man can buy cattle on those terms and become rich by it.

Besides that, one-half of the diseases of which these cattle die are just such diseases as cattle have died of in this country ever since it was discovered, the hollow-horn, the murrain, and other diseases of that character. And just as sure as the Government of the United States goes into the business of buying up sick cows then every cow that gets sick with the hollow-horn or anything else would be sure to have the pleuro-pneumonia, something that our farmers know nothing about and care very little about.

It is conceded that at present this disease is confined to three States and the District of Columbia; that this District is the seat of this rottenness, as during the last twenty years it has been the seat of a great deal of other kind of rottenness. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUNTON. Who concedes that?

Mr. HILL. The discussion here concedes it.

Mr. HUNTON. No, sir; my State and the District of Columbia and one or two other States have this disease.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] denies that it is in his State, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] says it has been wiped out in that State. Where is it, then, except in Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia?

Now, if this appropriation is put upon the ground that the State of Virginia is not able to meet this thing herself, I am willing to help that glorious old State, for it is my native State. But if Virginia is not able to take care of a few sick cattle within her own borders, it is the first time in the history of that great Commonwealth when she could not take care of her own local troubles, when she had any, without calling on the Government of the United States for assistance.

I am opposed to referring this subject to the Secretary of the Interior. He has no time to take charge of it; and besides, he knows nothing about it, and he has something else to do. If it must be attended to by anybody, let it be done by the Commissioner of Agriculture, whose duty it is made by law to look to these very subjects of interest to the farmers of this country.

Mr. BLOUNT. This matter is presented to us, Mr. Chairman, as something which has suddenly come upon the country; a fearful calamity threatening to produce material loss in amount equal to all the losses of the late war. The attempt is made to alarm us, to convince us that we must act now, that there is no time for delay.

The gentleman who moves this amendment tells you that in 1859 this disease was in Massachusetts, and that State suppressed it. It has been in other States, and it has been suppressed by them.

The proposition now is to appropriate $250,000 for the benefit of several States of this Union where it is alleged this disease now exists. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] asked very properly why it was that the Legislature of Virginia, when recently in session, did not appropriate a small sum of money for the purpose of destroying the diseased cattle in the small territory just across the river from here. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] tells us that they did not do that for the reason that it would not protect them; that if they had destroyed the disease where it existed in that State, in the little portion of her territory just across the river from here, it would be immediately reintroduced from this District.

Now, so far as this District is concerned, we can attend to that matter here. All of the States have heretofore taken this matter in charge. It does seem to me that it is wrong for this Congress to undertake in this hasty way to act upon this subject; to take this whole subject into their hands and go into the States armed with powers equal to any ever exercised by Congress in the reconstruction measures, armed with powers as unconstitutional as any which have been exercised in connection with elections, or in any other illegal manner.

I trust that we shall not thus hastily act upon this question and commit ourselves to this course. For one, I cannot see that there is a necessity for haste, and even if there is that we should act in this way. None of us expect that this bill, if it becomes a law at all, will be enacted into a law for weeks to come. Therefore, on that score, there is no reason why we should not have this subject referred to a separate committee, one charged with the examination and preparation of a law within the powers of this Congress, directed wisely for the purpose contemplated by the mover of this amendment.

Mr. BARBER. It is hardly possible to overestimate the importance of this subject. It was recently reported in the city of Chicago that one single case of this disease had been discovered at the stockyards. It is not too much to say that it produced the profoundest interest in that branch of the trade, that city being perhaps the greatest center of the cattle trade in the world. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that this matter should not be treated hastily; it ought, however, to be treated promptly. The nature of the cattle trade is such that it requires the intervention of the General Government. You cannot secure the harmony necessary for proper action on the part of the States. It will be utterly impossible in the West to control this disease without the intervention of the General Government. I agree with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that we should have a bill prepared with the greatest deliberation and with the utmost promptness.

Mr. CARLISLE. I am in favor of the exercise of the whole power of the General Government for the purpose of excluding from the country not only this disease, but all other infectious and contagious diseases. I represent a people who have a large interest in the subject now under consideration, and therefore I desire to see everything done that can be constitutionally done to protect their property against this destructive disease. But, sir, in order to do anything effectual in that direction we must be careful to do that only which we have the power to do; we must be careful that we pass no laws which cannot be executed by the officers selected to carry them out.

The only power which the Congress of the United States possesses over this subject, or any kindred subject, is that power which is necessarily involved in the exercise of the authority to regulate commerce between this country and foreign nations and between the several States and with the Indian tribes. I admit that in the exercise of that power to regulate commerce it is competent for Congress to pass such laws as will prevent the introduction of diseased cattle into this country as articles of commerce. I admit that it is competent for Congress to pass such laws as will prevent the railroads and the steamboats engaged in interstate commerce from carrying diseased cattle from one State to another. I admit that it is competent for Congress to pass such laws as may be necessary to provide inspection officers to ascertain whether the cattle being carried on any of these vehicles of commerce are diseased or not, and, if they are diseased, to prevent them from being carried. But, sir, the power of Congress over this subject ceases as soon as the article has left the vessels or the railroads and becomes the property of the local community. I admit that Congress possesses plenary police power over articles of commerce while in transitu. But my position is, that as soon as an article comes permanently within the jurisdiction of the State; as soon as it ceases to be carried as an article of commerce, the power of Congress ceases, and there is no authority over it except the local municipal authority of the State. It is then subject alone to the police power of the State; and any attempt by Congress or any department or officer of the General Government to seize that property for the purpose of eradicating disease or preventing its spread in the State would be nugatory and void.

Why, sir, if the Federal Government has power to seize cattle and destroy them in the State for the purpose of preventing the spread of disease, it certainly has the power to cure the cattle of the disease if it can. The same principle which authorizes the seizure and slaughter of diseased animals would authorize Congress to employ veterinary surgeons to cure them. The same principle which would authorize Congress to provide for local boards of health in the cities and States of this Union to look after the yellow fever and other infectious diseases would also authorize it to provide for the purchase of medicines and the employment of physicians to cure those diseases. Now, I think every gentleman who hears me will admit that these powers belong exclusively to the State governments; they are a part and parcel of that general police power in the exercise of which every State protects the lives, the property, the health, and the morals of all those residing within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction. The power of the Federal Government over these subjects is to a certain extent an external power: in the first place to prevent vessels engaged in commerce from bringing diseased cattle or diseased people into the country; in the next place to prevent them from being transported from one State to another in the course of commerce between the States.

Mr. COBB obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. CARLISLE.

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Chairman, I have said about all I desire to say on this subject. I venture to add that if the amendment proposed by my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] shall be incorporated into this bill and shall go upon the statute-book as a part of the law of the land, every effort which the people choose to make to resist the authority of these officers in seizing and slaughtering their cattle will be successful. I undertake to say that no officer of the Federal Government can rightfully go into a State to seize the property of the citizen and destroy it for any purpose; and whenever he attempts to exercise such a power the citizen may resist it successfully in the courts. If the Federal Government can do this for the purpose of preventing the spread of disease, so it can do it for the purpose of preventing the spread of immorality. If it can do this for the purpose of preserving the health of the people, so it can do it for the purpose of protecting the lives and property of the people. In other words, if this police power can be exercised by the General Government for one purpose, it can be exercised by it for all purposes over which the police power of a government ordinarily extends.

No principle is better settled in the jurisprudence of this country than that these police powers belong exclusively to the States. They constitute a part of that great mass of powers which the States of this Union have never granted or surrendered to the General Government. No decision can be found anywhere, not even the celebrated rinderpest decision, which goes beyond the rule I have laid down in these remarks, which is, that the whole power of the General Government is exhausted when it has regulated the commerce in the article.

I submit these remarks in no spirit of opposition to the purpose of this amendment, because, as I have already stated, the people of Kentucky, whom I in part represent, are largely interested in this subject. The most valuable herds of cattle to be found anywhere in this country perhaps are to be found in the "blue-grass" pastures of that State. Their value is almost incalculable; and the preservation of the health of these animals is a subject of vital importance not only to their owners but to those who consume them. Hence I desire that any law which may be passed here shall be so carefully drafted, so maturely considered, that it shall be clearly within the limits of the constitutional power of this Government, and can be effectually enforced after it has been enacted.

Mr. WRIGHT. My friend from Kentucky will allow me to ask whether it is not a constant practice when large fires are raging in our cities or elsewhere, to tear down and remove buildings which are the private property of citizens in order to stop the ravages of the flames?

Mr. CARLISLE. Why, sir, is it possible that my old democratic friend has forgotten the distinction between the powers of the State government and the powers of the General Government over such subjects as those? Will he undertake to say there has ever been an instance in the history of this country where the Federal authority, except in time of war by the military actually in the field, has undertaken to destroy the houses or other property of one citizen for the purpose of protecting the property of others or even the lives of others? I imagine he will not.

Mr. WRIGHT. There comes in the "general-welfare" clause.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Does he believe that Congress has the power to make this appropriation?

Mr. CARLISLE. I do.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Then if he believes that Congress has the power to make the appropriation——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. CARLISLE. I should like to answer the question put to me by my friend from Virginia. It will not take a minute.

Mr. BRAGG. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. If the gentleman from Kentucky believes Congress has the right to make the appropriation, has it not also the right to appoint the officers to disburse this fund? Or does he hold that one government shall vote the money and another government shall assume the control of its expenditure and appoint the officers to disburse it?

Mr. CARLISLE. I admit, as I have already said, that the Congress of the United States has power to appropriate this money to be used in preventing the introduction of this disease into this country, and in preventing it from being carried from one State to another in the vehicles engaged in commerce, such as steamboats, ships, railroads, &c.; but I deny that Congress has any power to pass a law appropriating money for the purpose of seizing property of the citizen in the State when it has ceased to be an article employed in the commerce of the country.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, the legal points stated by the gentleman from Kentucky have been so clearly and succinctly stated that I think there is not a lawyer in this House but will concede the correctness of his position, that the power of the General Government to regulate commerce refers to foreign and interstate commerce. Beyond that it has no extent whatever. It seems to me that is an answer to this whole proposition.

But, Mr. Chairman, I can scarcely allow this opportunity to pass without saying to this committee that I think I see signs of an epidemic breaking out here more dangerous than pleuro-pneumonia. [Laughter.] I see the Representatives of a State, who but a few days ago were declaring against a national quarantine, become affected by a sick cow in that State in such a manner as to call upon the Federal doctors to help them out. [Laughter.]

I cannot exactly see where the State-rights gentlemen plant themselves when they take ground against the exercise of a power which is clearly given in the Constitution of the United States and insist upon its exercise where at best the right to do so is doubtful, and I think clearly untenable.

If Congress is going to interfere in this matter, why not direct all our little towns and cities how they shall construct their sewers so as to preserve the public health? Why not control the filling up of sink-holes and places which breed pestilence? Why not make prescriptions as to how the fever and ague shall be treated, and how the swamps from which that disease is engendered shall be drained, filled up, and otherwise regulated?

It seems to me we are inclined to run a little mad on this subject, to mount the hobby, fling out our flag, and go right on for the purpose of some great progressive step on the part of the National Government on the pretense of doing some national act. What does it all amount to but that the grand panacea, the grand balm that heals everything, is an immense appropriation out of the Federal Treasury, to be distributed among men who know nothing about the subject in reference to which they are appointed to inquire?

It seems to me that if this matter is worthy of our attention, as it certainly is, it is a matter which should be gravely considered, which should go to a proper committee, that a proper method of exercising the powers vested in the General Government should be carefully devised, that such statistics should be offered as we may gather and publish for the interest of the States; and that we leave it to the States to take care of their cattle in their own borders, but prevent the spread of this disease from any foreign importation.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have not time now, if I had the disposition, to discuss the various constitutional questions suggested by the gentlemen who have already spoken. If I had the time, however, I apprehend I should find but little difficulty in satisfying a majority of the members of this House that the Federal Government has the power within limits properly defined to protect the health of the people as well as of animals. I should like to inquire of the gentlemen who adhere so strictly to the doctrine of State rights, my friend from Kentucky and the gentleman from Wisconsin, how by village regulation, as the latter gentleman has stated, or by State or municipal laws, as referred to by the latter, pleuro-pneumonia could have been kept out of Massachusetts in view of what the gentleman from that State has stated in reference to its introduction there?

Mr. BRAGG. Which gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Dr. LORING.

Mr. BRAGG. I did not hear the remarks of that gentleman.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. He stated that the disease came from the cattle imported into Massachusetts from some foreign country, I believe Holland. I would like to know what power is vested in the State of Massachusetts or in the municipal government of Boston to prevent a ship from landing its cargo at that port.

I will not undertake now, however, to discuss these questions. But there is one proposition that I desire to submit to the House; one reason above all others that have actuated me in my opposition to this amendment this morning. This is a question, gentlemen, of far more importance than the one to which you have given three weeks of angry and excited discussion. It is of far more importance than the one which is now being presented to you that in all probability will give rise to two months more of angry, heated, partisan discussion. Now, if you want any measure adopted to stamp out this fearful plague which threatens to destroy so much of the material interests in the Western States, then I say keep it off this appropriation bill, which, unless my judgment is greatly at fault, will not leave this House under two months from to-day. Meanwhile it is my purpose at the very first opportunity to use this as a leverage as it were to force through the House at an early day a bill already carefully considered and prepared that covers this whole subject.

I appeal to the common sense of this House for once to let a regard for the public welfare rise above partisan passion, and to lay aside the bill we are now considering, and consider this one for the protection of the lives of our people as well as for the suppression of the fearful cattle plague which is becoming so destructive in the Western States.

I say to gentlemen who are specially interested in this subject that the pending bill, in my judgment, will remain where it is and not become a law under two months, if at all. But if the course I have suggested be pursued with reference to this subject, there is little doubt we can enact into a law within one week from to-day the bill to which I have referred.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. My interest in this question, which is the interest of my constituents and of the West generally, and in fact of the whole country, must be my excuse for again talking about it. There can no proposition be made on this floor, however practical in its nature, but gentlemen with constitutional scruples will be able to raise what are apparently very grave objections to it. Much that has been said by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] has been well said, but I do not think it applies to this amendment. Why, sir, the very object of the formation of a federal government is to promote the general welfare. And the gentleman admits that we have complete power to make this appropriation; that we have complete power to prevent the bringing of this plague to the ports of the United States; that we have complete power to reach out the hand of the Federal Government there and lay it upon that disease so as to prevent its spread. Yet the gentleman says that if in the State of Maryland, one rod from the Pennsylvania line if you please, or one rod from the Virginia line, this disease exists, dangerous and destructive in its nature, and the State of Maryland refuses, through carelessness or otherwise, to lay its hand upon it, every other State of the Union must be at the mercy of the people of the State of Maryland or of West Virginia. I think that is too narrow a construction of the Constitution.

Now, sir, the amendment which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has offered does not necessarily mean that the Secretary of the Interior must in any or in all instances make regulations providing the machinery by which this disease is to be stamped out by a Federal officer. Under the grant of power given by the proposed amendment the Secretary of the Interior has the right to co-operate by regulation with the State authority. I have no doubt in my own mind, but he has the right to go further and seize the animal in a given case and slaughter it and make compensation out of the appropriation. The gentleman says he has no such authority. Very well; if he attempts to exercise any authority which does not belong to him, the courts are open. But I think we can make at least as good an argument on the one side as you can on the other. But that he would have the right to co-operate by regulation with the State authority cannot be questioned.

Yet the gentleman says, send it to a committee. It has been to a committee for two years past; it has been called to the attention of the House time after time; it has received investigation after investigation, and will continue to receive investigation until the end of this Congress without action, in my opinion, unless we have some such legislation as this at this time. It will not do when the whole commerce of the country in live stock not only between the States but with foreign nations is affected to sit back and spilt hairs and delay, forsooth, because somebody has a constitutional scruple. In this country with its thirty-eight States bound together by eighty thousand miles of railroad, with our manifold, intertwined interests, with our vast foreign and interstate commerce, I cannot admit that the Constitution has not elasticity sufficient to cover the amendment we are now considering, especially as it directly affects not only our foreign but our interstate commerce also.

Mr. BRIGHT. I take the floor for the purpose of yielding it to my friend on my right, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman from Tennessee has already uttered partly what I was about to say. I am as anxious as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to have prompt action, but we are putting this matter in an appropriation bill which will not be disposed of for weeks, and I think it will be more practicable if we instruct a committee or the Committee on Appropriations or the National Board of Health to report a bill. It would be impossible for the Commissioner of Agriculture or the Secretary of the Interior to lay down in a set of directions the legislation necessary; and I would suggest as a substitute for all these matters the following: unanimous consent, we are told, can do anything except hang a man, and if the House will agree that this amendment which I propose shall be substituted for all that is proposed and will be adopted by the House, the question can come up on Monday. I desire to offer at the proper time the following amendment:

The National Board of Health is hereby instructed to consider the propriety and necessity of legislating to prevent the introduction and spread of contagious diseases among cattle and to report promptly with a draught of a bill for the purpose if it shall be deemed best.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If that legislation can be passed before this appropriation bill passes, well and good; but let the provision stay in the bill, as it will probably be two months before the bill passes.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to strike out the last word in the amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. If I may do so, I offer what I have read as a substitute for the pending amendment and for the paragraph in the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Connecticut if he offers this as a substitute for the amendment originally offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] and the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] including the paragraph in the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that such an amendment would not be in order. There are two amendments pending now.

Mr. REAGAN. I agree very fully with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] in his general statement of constitutional doctrines. I am not prepared to say that I agree with him as to the application of those doctrines to the question now before the committee. I dislike to attempt at all to discuss a question involving constitutional principles that are sprung upon us without any opportunity for consideration or examination. It was conceded by him that under the power to regulate commerce among the States and the Indian tribes we might prescribe regulations to prevent the introduction of diseased cattle, and that we might prescribe regulations as to their transportation from State to State as a matter of commerce.

Will it be assumed, then, that the States having no extra-territorial jurisdiction the Federal Government cannot take any steps under the power to regulate commerce to arrest the progress of the disease among the cattle of the country—a disease which may involve the loss of a great many millions of dollars of property to the people of this country? I want time to look into the constitutional question, and I do not desire to be understood as being conclusively committed to what I shall say upon the subject.

We find that the Government has habitually legislated for the promotion of the interests of agriculture. Where does the authority come from? We find that we are printing hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of agricultural reports annually; that we are appropriating money to keep up a separate department for the purpose of collecting and diffusing information for the promotion of the agricultural interests of the country. We appropriate large sums of money to collect and distribute choice seeds of various kinds to the different portions of the country so as to increase the value of the productions of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that this debate has been proceeding irregularly. Two amendments are before the committee, and a third is not in order. The committee must dispose of the pending amendments or they must be withdrawn before the debate can proceed.

Mr. HUNTON. I have no objection to the gentleman from Texas finishing his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate is proceeding out of order. There are three amendments pending.

Mr. ATKINS. The debate has been proceeding out of order for the last hour and a half, so far as that is concerned. But this is an important question, and I desire, as I suppose other members of the House do, that it shall be discussed.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. MILLS.) It would be better for the committee to proceed in regular order. One of the pending amendments can be withdrawn and then renewed, as is often done in the case of formal amendments, and then the debate could continue without a violation of the rules.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I will withdraw my amendment and renew it.

I was proceeding to inquire where we got the authority for promoting agricultural interests and prosperity of this country. There is no express provision of the Constitution conferring that power upon Congress. I have not time now to go into that subject, but without having had time to examine the constitutional question I will say that it has occurred to me that this interest was one of such vast importance that some means should be devised to control a disease which is likely to inflict such calamities upon the property of the country. And the subject not being within the power of the States, except so far as their own territory is concerned, we in Congress might, under the power to regulate commerce, do what it is not competent for the States to do.

Gentlemen tell me that the States have the right to make police regulations; that many of them have local regulations concerning the preservation of the public health. When they tell me that, they tell me of what is within the peculiar and exclusive jurisdiction of the State governments, in regard to that which is not likely to inflict any injury upon the contiguous States. But when we come to consider this subject, the subject of a disease which passes by contagion or infection from State to State, a disease which no State has the power to arrest, then I must be very clear that there was no power in the Federal Government to provide the remedy suggested by this provision before I come to the conclusion that we are powerless to protect such vast amounts of property in this country.

I do not propose, however, in a five-minute debate and without previous examination of the authorities, to discuss the constitutional question in connection with this matter.

Mr. ATKINS. I trust now that the Committee of the Whole will vote upon this proposition.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to say——

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. BLACKBURN.) The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] will see that it is not within the power of the Chairman to stop debate.

Mr. ATKINS. I was in hopes that we could now take a vote upon this proposition; but I see that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] desires to be heard.

Mr. HOOKER. I have listened to the observations made in the progress of this debate in reference to the power of the Federal Government over this question, and also in reference to its power to establish a national quarantine. It has been said that this is quite as important a question as that. I regard them as both important.

I do not think that under the Constitution any possible objection can be raised to the exercise of this power by the Federal Government. During the discussion of the proposition to create a national board of health, the purpose and object of which was to establish a national quarantine, I had occasion to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] who at the time was discussing the question, that I did not see how the doctrine of the rights of the States, in contradistinction to the powers of the General Government, could possibly be involved. Nor can I see how it can be involved in this question.

This is a question of the utmost importance to that industry which has been referred to by my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] as having oftentimes been legislated for by the Government of the United States; that great agricultural interest which is the foundation of all others. Since I have had the honor of occupying a seat in this House, in this Congress and in former Congresses, I have seen the attention of members absorbed from day to day, and week to week, and month to month, upon almost every other subject than that which involves the fostering care and attention of the Federal Government of this great agricultural interest.

And when we come to consider a cognate proposition, one involving the protection of that great interest, I cannot see how it can be said that there rises up in opposition to the exercise of this power some of the rights inherent in the States. I have always believed in preserving the powers of the States everywhere. I have always believed, and I hesitate not to say here and elsewhere, in the language of that great expounder of the Constitution when he sat in the Senate of the United States, that the States are the very nostrils of the Federal Government, and without their aid and consent it could not exist for a single moment.

While, however, that is true, still, to the extent to which the States have conceded the power to the Federal Government, I cannot think there can be any doubt that this is within the exercise of that power. I say, therefore, that I hope the proposition of my friend from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] as amended by the proposition of my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] will meet the approbation of the House. I hope we shall for once at least show that the House of Representatives is willing to wield the power with which it is clothed for the protection of that great agricultural interest upon which everything else depends.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I have but one suggestion to make. I am about as much interested in this question as any gentleman on this floor. The people of my district, as well as throughout my State, are largely engaged in cattle-raising and cattle-shipping. Besides, as has been stated, Chicago is the great cattle-shipping point of this country. The people of my district and of my State have suffered exceedingly within the last few years from the diseases among foreign cattle; and because of this fact I am anxious that some measure to counteract the spread of such diseases should be enacted into a law. Because of the losses which have been suffered by the people of my district, of my State, and of the western country generally, I want prompt action. Now it strikes me that we cannot get as prompt action by attaching this measure to an appropriation bill as we can by some other means. If we attach the measure to this bill it may not become a law for six months, if gentlemen on the other side and gentlemen on this side persist in the stand they have respectively taken. Now what is the remedy? I concur in the suggestion that has been made as to the propriety of turning this matter over to the Committee on Agriculture, with instructions to examine the subject thoroughly and report a bill to the House at the earliest opportunity. This question being of such great importance, it ought to be most thoroughly considered; and any measure that we may adopt on the subject ought to be carefully guarded. Let the Committee on Agriculture be instructed to take hold of the matter and after careful consideration present a bill embracing proper safeguards. Let us enact such a bill into a law; and then we shall have something sound to depend upon; we shall have something effective, something that will accomplish the end we desire. I hope that the suggestion made in this direction will be adopted.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to renew the amendment which I withdrew a short time ago.

Mr. HAWLEY. I offer the following as a substitute for the pending paragraph and all pending amendments thereto:

The Committee on Agriculture is hereby instructed to consider the propriety and necessity of legislation to check the introduction and spread of contagious diseases among domestic animals, with leave to report at any time by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HUNTON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I ask whether, in the opinion of the Chair, this amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. What objection does the gentleman raise to it?

Mr. HUNTON. I was about to state the objection. There is already pending an amendment offered by myself, and to that an amendment has been offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] It seems to me that this amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut is in the third degree, and therefore is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of the gentleman from Virginia is not well taken. There may be pending at the same time, under the rules, an amendment, an amendment to that amendment, a substitute for those two amendments, and an amendment to that substitute.

Mr. STEPHENS. I call for the reading of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] in connection with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1951 strike out "twenty-five" and insert "two hundred and fifty."

In the same line, after the word "dollars," insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Add to the paragraph the following:

Provided, That said sum, or any part thereof, may be expended by the Secretary of the Interior under such rules as he may prescribe; and proper vouchers shall be preserved of all such expenditures; and he shall report the action under this law to each regular session of Congress, showing the sum of money expended and for what purposes. And authority is hereby given to the Secretary of the Interior to prescribe regulations under which cattle afflicted with the disease of pleuro-pneumonia may be seized, appraised, and slaughtered, and payment therefor made out of money hereby appropriated.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Connecticut be again read.

The Clerk again read the substitute.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Connecticut to the fact that it is not competent for a Committee of the Whole House to grant to a committee of the House the leave which his substitute proposes.

Mr. HUNTON. I rose to make that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman need not make it; the Committee of the Whole cannot adopt instructions in the form submitted by the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. If I strike out the concluding clause, "with leave to report at any time by bill or otherwise," will that obviate the objection? Let the proposition read that "the Committee on Agriculture be instructed to consider," &c. Will that be admissible?

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole cannot instruct a committee of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. If I substitute "requested" for "instructed," will that obviate the objection?

Mr. MILLS. Is not any resolution of the Committee of the Whole a simple recommendation to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that any action of this kind will have no effect except as a recommendation to the House.

Mr. MILLS. Then is not the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut a simple recommendation that the House instruct the Committee on Agriculture?

The CHAIRMAN. Then, in the judgment of the Chair, it should be so worded.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let my amendment be so modified as to read "that the House be requested to instruct," &c.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Is not the proposition subject to another point of order? Can we in a bill which is to pass both Houses and go to the President for approval refer a subject to a committee of this House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that the Committee of the Whole House has a right to instruct one of the standing committees of the House to do anything. The Chair is disposed to hold the substitute in order provided it be framed so as simply to recommend to the House the reference of the question to a committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is that in order by way of a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so holds.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then the gentleman from Connecticut makes that motion.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the amendment is adopted and concurred in by the House does it not carry the whole bill to the Committee on Agriculture by becoming a part and parcel of the general appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will restate his inquiry.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If it be incorporated into the legislative appropriation bill does it not carry the whole bill to the Committee on Agriculture?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so hold.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If the substitute be adopted does it not become a part of the bill?

Mr. ATKINS. It only refers this branch to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sees no difficulty as suggested by the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman from Connecticut moves by way of substitute that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia shall be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. HAWLEY. If that be in order then I make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to say a word. I have already indicated sufficiently the reasons why, in my judgment, this matter should not be entangled with this great appropriation bill. My primary object is that the House may reach speedy action, and I hope if my substitute be adopted that when the committee rises this afternoon the House will unanimously send this subject to the Committee on Agriculture with instruction to make speedy report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CHALMERS. I desire to amend that by suggesting it go to the committee appointed to look into the prevention of contagious diseases in the country. That is the proper committee I think for its reference, and I make that amendment.

Mr. DIBRELL. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. I think the Committee on Agriculture is the proper committee to have this subject under consideration. Half a dozen good farmers will know ten times more about this disease of pleuro-pneumonia and know better how to stop it than any of these health physicians can know about it. [Laughter.] I venture to say that the Committee on Epidemic Diseases or the National Board of Health know nothing at all about the diseases of sick cattle; how many upper teeth a cow has or the difference between a muley cow and a short-horn Durham. [Laughter.] The Committee on Agriculture is the proper committee to which this subject should be referred for investigation, and I hope that amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say if either of the propositions offered as a substitute for my amendment be adopted it will be the end of all relief on this subject during this session of Congress. I have no doubt, sir, in my mind, that if the committee adopt the substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky or the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi it will be an end of this question for this session of Congress. If the appropriation is not placed in this bill no relief will be obtained.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, I do not concur at all in the views expressed by the gentleman who has just taken his seat. Why should he say or why should we believe if this is not incorporated in this appropriation bill nothing will be done at this session? Congress certainly is competent to act and it has plenty of time in which to do so. It may take any action on this or any other subject it may deem proper. I concur entirely in the views expressed by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.] This is a large question. It involves a vast amount of property. Great public interests are concerned. I do not approve at all of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. It gives entirely too much power, in my judgment, to the Secretary of the Interior. I do not speak now of the conflict of power between the States and the Federal Government, but it puts too much power into the hands of any one man to make rules and regulations to govern the condemnation and confiscation of property. I think we ought to have time to digest whatever is proper to be done on this great subject.

Many of the views expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts I concur in. This Government has the power so far as police regulations are concerned to prevent the importation of diseased cattle. It has the power and it is its duty to interfere to prevent the spread of that disease. It has the power to regulate interstate commerce. I think the action of this House in the execution of those powers should be more considerate than the amendment of my friend from Texas. I therefore concur in the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, or which is equivalent to the same thing, in voting down these amendments and letting the whole matter go to the committee in the proper form. If we adopt his amendment we will all understand the Committee on Agriculture is the proper committee which should take charge of this subject and report upon it.

Mr. ATKINS. The pending question, as I understand, is on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS,] is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the gentleman insist on his amendment?

Mr. CHALMERS. I do.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I ask the committee to vote on it.

Mr. CHALMERS. I desire to say a word or two. I do not think this is a matter which depends on how many upper teeth a cow has got or on the difference between a muley and a short-horn Durham. I do not think it is a matter involving anything as to the structure of cattle or questions of agriculture. It is a question depending on the very same principle as that of the yellow fever; the very same principle that has been discussed in this House as to the power of the Government to keep contagious diseases not only from the Government itself but from passing from one State into another. It involves scientific questions, legal questions—questions which agricultural gentlemen are not supposed to understand. Therefore I think the proper committee is the one which has been organized by the Speaker to take into consideration the best mode of preventing infectious diseases from being introduced into the country.

Mr. HAWLEY. Did not that refer to mankind?

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes, sir; that was intended to refer to mankind. But I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that a bill passed some years ago in reference to cattle was placed on the same principle, and debated on the same principle by Congress, as the bill for the prevention of contagious diseases affecting man. They are infectious in both instances. They are brought from foreign countries into our country; and the right to make the one law gives the right to make the other. Many of us here are deeply interested in having a law passed to prevent the introduction of diseases infectious to man; all of us are interested more or less in preventing the introduction of diseases infectious to animals. The two should be put together; and I submit that the amendment I have offered ought to be adopted.

Mr. DOWNEY. This is a matter of peculiar interest to the Territory of Wyoming, which I have the honor to represent. Not only are the people of the Territories interested. I know that sums of money amounting to more than $1,000,000 from the city of Providence, Rhode Island, and the city of Boston, Massachusetts, are now on the way to Washington Territory and Oregon for the purpose of buying herds of cattle and bringing them back East.

This is a question pertinent to this bill and very much so, for this reason, that if this disease once gets into the herds of cattle in the great West your Army will cost millions of dollars to feed where it now costs thousands. Our stockmen all over the country are moving in this matter and endeavoring to the utmost of their power to create an interest in it. The stock-raisers in my Territory and the other Territories have passed resolutions ordering diseased cattle to be taken from the cars in transit and killed, and no high-minded stockman in the country would object for a moment to that being done.

I was talking about this matter to a gentleman from New Jersey, and he told me some of his cattle were supposed to have pleuro-pneumonia. As soon as the matter came to his attention he directed surgeons to be sent for to make an investigation, and said he would rather give up all his cattle than be the means of spreading the disease.

This is a serious matter to the Territories, and I ask you, gentlemen, in your wisdom to take such action as the exigencies of the case may require. I have said that if this disease spreads, where it costs you now thousands to feed your Army it will cost millions. And furthermore, there are the large supplies for the Indians, the cost of which will be greatly increased. With all earnestness I ask you to consider well what should be done. It appears to me something should be done now.

Another view has occurred to me in connection with this matter. This bill perhaps may not become law. If it should be vetoed it may hang for a considerable time; whereas if a separate measure should be introduced dealing with this subject it might get through both Houses and be signed by the President before many days elapse. It is a matter of great interest to the people generally; but, as I have said, it possesses a very special interest for the people of the Territories whom I have the honor in part to represent, and I desire to impress on the minds of gentlemen that view of the subject in reaching a conclusion with regard to it.

Mr. ATKINS. Let us now have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] was entertained by the Chair as a motion in the nature of a substitute for the pending paragraph and the amendments thereto. If agreed to it will amount to a recommendation to the House to strike out the clause of the bill to which the amendments have been offered and to send the subject to the Committee on Agriculture. To that substitute the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] offers an amendment proposing to refer the subject to the Committee on Contagious Diseases.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. CHALMERS, there were—ayes 49, noes 66.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. HAWLEY's substitute; and being put, there were—ayes 129, noes not counted.

So the substitute was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read as follows:

For postage on return letters, circulars, and miscellaneous articles, for correspondents and foreign letters, $4,000.

Mr. HASKELL. For the purpose of perfecting the amendment I offered yesterday, I offer the following amendment to come in at the close of that clause:

United States entomological commission:

To provide for investigation into the habits of the cotton-worm and other insects injurious to the cotton-plant and to agriculture, with a view of preventing their injuries, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read as follows:

Southern claims commission:

For pay of three commissioners to the 10th day of March, 1880, at the rate of $5,000 per annum each; one clerk, at the rate of $2,500; one stenographer, at the rate of $2,500; one messenger, at the rate of $1,200; three additional clerks, at the rate of $1,200 each; in all, $17,222.21.

For compensation of three investigating agents, at $6 per day when actually employed; also traveling expenses of agents, fees and mileage to Government witnesses, cost of summoning witnesses, fees to commissioners for taking testimony, fees for abstracts and exemplifications of public records relating to claims and claimants, $6,000.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask that the paragraphs in relation to the southern claims commission be read, and I shall then offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is in order to offer an amendment now.

Mr. BRAGG. My amendment will come in more appropriately after all the paragraphs in relation to the southern claims commission have been read.

Mr. ATKINS. Allow me to suggest that by unanimous consent the Clerk read the other paragraphs relating to this subject, because upon the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin the whole question will be determined.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, then, understands that by unanimous consent the gentleman is entitled to offer his amendment after the next two paragraphs are read. The Chair hears no objection to that.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I desire to offer the following amendment: to strike out all after line 2075 down to line 2081, inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

For compensation of six investigating agents at $5 per day, when actually employed; also traveling expenses of agents, fees and mileage to Government witnesses, cost of summoning Government witnesses, fees to commissioners for taking testimony, fees for abstracts and exemplifications of public records relating to claims and claimants, $12,000: Provided, That said agents shall give notice to claimants whose claims it is proposed to investigate of the time and places of taking testimony, who shall have the right to cross-examine every witness who may testify in behalf of the Government, and said agents shall also take the testimony of any and all witnesses who may be presented by the claimant, and all such testimony, both in behalf of the claimant and the Government, shall be taken under the laws and rules which usually govern the taking of testimony.

I will reserve what I have to say until after the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] is disposed of, as it is possible that the adoption of that amendment will preclude the necessity of mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption or rejection of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Very well; I have but a few words to say. It has been the custom to send agents to investigate all claims pending against the Government. The course pursued by these agents has had a tendency to embarrass both the Government and the claimant. The testimony they have taken has always been ex parte, the claimants having no opportunity of cross-examination, and in many instances they have been denied the privilege of even seeing what the witnesses had sworn to. There are now pending before Congress and the different Departments of the Government probably fifty thousand of these claims, though I am not prepared now to state the exact number; but it certainly approximates the figures I have given, and in all probability exceeds them.

It is utterly impossible in the nature of things that three investigating agents can make any satisfactory investigation of these claims and report to Congress in the next twenty years. I do not propose now to discuss the question of claims in general, or whether they ought to be paid or rejected, but I hold that every citizen of this Government has a right to be heard before this body; and to limit the number of investigating agents to three is practically to close the door against any man who has a claim pending before any department of the Government or before Congress, thus virtually denying to every man who has a demand against the Government an opportunity to ever have his claim fairly considered. Better abolish the commission on claims altogether and create some other tribunal in its place.

I know how anxious the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] is to have these claims paid, and I therefore want to smooth the way for him all I can. But it is for this body to determine what action should be taken in reference to these claims. Now, it must be apparent that if the investigation goes on as heretofore there will never be an end of it. I wish they could be taken from the consideration of Congress altogether; but while this body is called upon to investigate them all the means for doing the work practically and effectively should be furnished for that purpose, and therefore I offer this amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I trust the gentleman will modify his amendment by striking out $12,000 and inserting $6,000.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Very well; I have no objection to that.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] to an inquiry I desire to make of him. I desire to know who is to pay the expense of taking the testimony offered on behalf of the claimants?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I provide in my amendment that the Government witnesses alone shall be paid.

Mr. KEIFER. Do you provide in your amendment that the Government shall pay the expenses on behalf of the claimants?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I do not.

Mr. KEIFER. Who does pay the expenses?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The claimants pay them if paid at all.

Mr. KEIFER. No provision is made here for their payment?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. None at all. I am willing that the Government shall have that much advantage.

Mr. KEIFER. No provision at all is made for their payment?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. None at all; that is, no provision for the Government to pay them. The claimants can arrange that themselves.

Mr. KEIFER. Is there any provision made to pay the officers who take the testimony?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The agents will be paid, and also the officers taking the testimony.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] to yield to me to offer an amendment which I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] will perhaps accept.

Mr. KEIFER. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOOKER. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And no testimony shall be taken in regard to any claim against the Government, either by the Government or the claimant, without due notice to the Government and the claimant, according to the laws of the State where the testimony is taken which prevail in the chancery courts of said State.

Mr. KEIFER. I hope that amendment will not be accepted.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I would have no objection to it, only I am afraid it might imperil the amendment I have offered. I think my amendment already covers substantially the ground sought to be covered by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.] The addition of his amendment might possibly endanger my amendment, and this I desire to avoid, for it is a matter of too much importance to a great number of people to take any chances in losing it.

Mr. KEIFER. I simply desire to have the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] perfected. While I am utterly opposed to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER,] I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that he should provide in his amendment that the testimony of witnesses offered on behalf of the claimants shall be taken, when the expense of taking it is first paid by the claimant.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOUK. I desire to suggest that if it is the purpose of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] to aid and facilitate the early examination of these claims, his amendment will defeat the purpose of the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. YOUNG.] To encumber this process of investigation with all the machinery of the States in regard to taking testimony will so hamper and clog the agent in his investigation as to defeat the purpose of the amendment of my colleague.

Mr. HOOKER. I was induced to offer the amendment which the Clerk has read in consequence of information which has come to me in the progress of the investigation of these claims under the claims commission. I have been informed that it is the custom of the southern claims commission to send out agents, after the evidence pro and con has been closed, for the purpose of taking ex parte testimony. I am aware of the fact that this course has been pursued by the commission probably with a view to guard against fraudulent claims against the Government. I would be very glad to give my aid here by my voice and vote to any measure which shall guard the Government against fraudulent claims.

But this practice of taking ex parte testimony ought never to be allowed. It is utterly unknown to any other court. The Government should be clothed with no power or authority or should have no more favoritism than the claimant himself. They should both stand fairly on their rights to take evidence after due notice, according to the rules of the courts in the States where the evidence is to be taken. That is to say, both the Government and the claimant should be required to give ten, twenty, or thirty days' notice to the opposite party before any testimony is allowed to be taken.

Then the testimony should be taken before a commission or a sworn officer authorized to take testimony, and either party after due notification should be allowed to be present and cross-examine the witnesses. I think, therefore, that my amendment makes plain what is left ambiguous in the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. YOUNG,] and I must ask for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. ELAM. I suggest that should the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] be adopted there will be a class of claimants in my own State which it would not reach. We have there no chancery court. I suggest to him to change his amendment so as to provide for the taking of the testimony according to the rules of the court having common law or chancery jurisdiction.

Mr. HOOKER. I am willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I think I can meet the purpose desired. I provide in my amendment that notice shall be given to the claimant. As a matter of course it follows that the notice must be a legal one, and I presume that would mean in accordance with the law of the State, whatever that may be, in regard to the giving of notice. It seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] is not necessary to accomplish the purpose I have in view, while the amendment I have offered will meet the object sought by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ELAM.]

Mr. PRICE. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] a question. The object of his amendment in part is to facilitate the investigation of these claims?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRICE. You increase the number of agents?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRICE. But you do not increase the pay; you leave the appropriation at $6,000, as I understand?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRICE. And you do not get any more work done with six agents than you would with three?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I think it very probable we can. I made this reduction at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. PRICE. So I understand.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Because I feared that otherwise the amendment would be subject to a point of order. I think that $6,000 would probably pay the expenses of six agents for four, five, or six months. At all events, it is provided that they shall receive only $5 a day while actually engaged.

Now, many localities where claims are pending against the Government cannot be safely visited by agents except during a few months of the year. Last year a number of agents were sent to my own district at my request. They arrived there about July, and very soon afterward the fever broke out, when they left without examining a single witness. The months of the winter or the early spring are about the only time when agents can prosecute this work. I think in order to avoid the point of order we might let the amendment pass in this form, providing that $6,000 shall cover all expenses actually incurred.

Mr. PRICE. I only wanted to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that six men cannot do any more work with $6,000 than three could.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I think differently, particularly when it is considered that the work must be done within a few months.

Mr. BAKER. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee what particular service is now rendered by these three investigating agents under the southern claims commission?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. They are sent to localities where claimants reside. Claims come here in the form of petitions to Congress or applications to different departments of the Government; and in order to protect the Government against the perpetration of frauds there was adopted some years ago the system of sending agents to the localities where the claimants reside to investigate the facts. These agents heretofore have gone to different localities and made investigations which have been wholly ex parte, without notice to the claimants, who in many instances have not been able to ascertain what the witness testified to until somebody here in Washington had examined the records. Such a practice imposes great hardship on claimants and embarrasses the Government very much in the proper determination of claims.

Mr. BAKER. If these investigating agents take testimony secretly and that testimony is used in the ultimate determination of cases by the southern claims commission, it is a reprehensible practice. But I have information from one of the judges of the commission that the sole purpose of employing these agents is this: when testimony has been taken on the part of a claimant and the judges of the commission have reason to believe from the character of the evidence that it is untruthful, they send these agents to the neighborhood from which the witnesses come to inquire into their character and to ascertain whether or not rebutting evidence can be found. The facts are reported to the judges of the commission; and if upon such report they believe that the case made by the claimant can be rebutted, then evidence is taken in the ordinary way.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. No; the gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension. If he will give me his attention for a moment I will explain. These agents are not sent out by the claims commission; they are sent out by the Quartermaster and Commissary-General; and the character of the evidence which they collect is such, I apprehend, as could scarcely be used in any court of justice. Certainly no testimony taken purely ex parte would be regarded by the judges of the claims commission, if they are qualified for their positions. My information is that no testimony of that sort goes before those commissioners at all.

Mr. BAKER. Let me inquire of the gentleman whether these three investigating agents are not confined exclusively to service under the southern claims commission?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. No, sir; they act under the direction of the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. BAKER. I apprehend that it is utterly impossible that they should be employed under the Quartermaster-General. We have now under consideration a clause providing for the southern claims commission. Line 2075 provides for "three investigating agents." These agents are employed by the commissioners, not in the method suggested by the gentleman. They are employed exclusively by the southern claims commissioners, and by nobody else. The purpose of the gentleman will not be accomplished by increasing the number of these agents for the southern claims commission, for the commissioners do not desire any more than three. Investigating agents for the Quartermaster-General's Department or any other Department of the Government ought to be provided for under the proper head. While these claims commissioners are not asking any more than three investigating agents, why is it necessary to provide for more?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I know as a matter of personal knowledge (because I have it from the Quartermaster-General himself) that these agents are sent out under his direction. I had a conversation with him before I left here last summer, and induced him to send two of these agents to my district, who, as I said a few minutes ago, were obliged to leave in consequence of the appearance of the fever. I do not know whether the southern claims commissioners ever send out agents of this kind or not; but I do know, as a lawyer, that if they send out such agents and then act on ex parte testimony of this kind, their court is one of the strangest tribunals I ever heard of and is a disgrace to the judiciary of the country. If the members of that commission are guilty of such conduct they should be stripped of the ermine and driven in disgrace from the positions which they occupy.

Mr. BAKER. Let me suggest that I know from personal information, derived from one of the judges, that they do send them out for the purpose I have indicated, but for no other purpose. The gentleman is talking of one class of agents, to wit, those employed in the Quartermaster-General's Department, and I am talking about those referred to in the class which he asks us to strike out.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. This, of course, does not come out of my time. Accepting the theory of the gentleman as the true one, and still my amendment shall prevail. Now, it is a vicious practice——

Mr. BAKER. They do not need but three.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I am willing to reduce the number to three, but the other provision should remain. It is unjust to the claimants to send out these agents of the southern claims commission to examine witnesses affecting the validity of their claims without giving them notice or advising them of the facts testified to. It is in violation of every rule of testimony with which I am acquainted. I am willing to strike out "six" and insert "three investigating agents."

Mr. ATKINS. I trust the gentleman will do so.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I will so modify my amendment, allowing the remaining portion to stand.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HERBERT. I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

Add to the amendment the following:
And the judges of the southern claims commission shall prescribe and publish rules for the taking of testimony, and shall provide in all cases for full and fair notice to be given of the time and place of taking thereof.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I have no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, as amended.

Mr. BAKER. I offer an amendment to the original text, as follows:

In line 2075, after the word "agents," insert "whose report shall not be used as evidence by said commissioners."

Mr. BRAGG. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana a question. What do you want investigating agents to make reports for if you cannot use them after you get them?

Mr. BAKER. I will explain to the gentleman from Wisconsin. Investigating agents, as I understand now from the information of one of the judges of that commission, are simply for this purpose: whenever evidence is produced before that commission by a claimant and the commission suspect the character of that evidence they have these agents who are sent into the locality for the purpose of investigating into it and reporting the facts they ascertain to the commissioners. Then if the commissioners believe the interests of the Government demand evidence should be taken in the ordinary method for the purpose of meeting the case made by the claimant, they take that evidence on the information obtained by these investigating agents. That, I understand, is the present method. I have it, at any rate, from one of the judges of that court. In order to make it entirely certain, I have offered this amendment. It simply empowers this commission to protect the interests of the General Government by sending these agents to investigate the facts and report them to the commission. If the commission should then judge it to be necessary in order to meet the claim made by the claimant, they will take the testimony in the ordinary method now provided by law. It seems to me that is right.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the gentleman from Indiana is in error as to the present state of the law relating to the use of these investigating agents. I understand, after having examined a great many of the records which have passed through the hands of the southern claims commission, that after all the testimony has been taken and submitted (and, unfortunately for the Government, sometimes submitted on the testimony on the part of the claimant alone) they send out one of their investigating agents, who goes into the region of country where the claimant lives or the claim arose and there secretly, privately, and otherwise gathers such information as he can, taking ex parte affidavits for his own benefit or not, as he chooses, and finally makes a report upon which the court very often decides the claim. I know they decide the claims, and when the claimant could not have the opportunity even of seeing that report before the decision was made. I cannot be mistaken about this. I have near me a gentleman who served as one of these investigating agents, and he made many of these reports, and he has made them, I venture to say, as I have stated, on such testimony as he chose to take himself, without notice to the claimant.

I say, sir, that in many cases these agents have made grave mistakes in reference to these claims. I know the commissioners have said they have afterward found there were mistakes, honestly made I have no doubt, but mistakes upon which they acted in making their decision.

Now, the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana I cannot well understand. He proposes to allow these agents to make report, not to be treated as testimony, but to leave their report possibly to stand as before, not as testimony, but some sort of secret information which the commissioners should take into their private rooms to influence their minds possibly in rejecting the claim.

I do not care whether you call it testimony; it never was testimony; it never rose to the dignity of testimony; yet it disposed of very many important claims. It is not testimony as it is now taken, in the strict sense of the word. But the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] is to require testimony on behalf of the Government to be taken, according to the ordinary rules of taking depositions, the claimant having the right of cross-examination, and that the testimony of witnesses on behalf of the claimant shall also be taken; so that if there be anything in the testimony of a witness which should be searched out, it may be done by cross-examination. The Government has the right to appear and cross-examine the witnesses of the claimant and the claimant should have the right to appear and cross-examine the witnesses on behalf of the United States. And when that is done in the usual and ordinary manner, it is then submitted to the commissioners; and they themselves would be glad to have it in that form.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER. I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER,] which looks to perfecting the text of the bill.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I would like to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Indiana. I wish to call for a statement from one of my colleagues on this point.

The question propounded by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] was a very proper and pertinent one. I am unable to discover what purpose would be accomplished by these investigating agents taking testimony if it is not to be used as evidence in some court having the power to determine these claims. If it is not to be so used, or if there is any court in this country that will determine a case and decide a claim on ex parte testimony, I submit that it is quite time that such court should be abolished. I cannot believe that the southern claims commission has ever been guilty of so gross a judicial outrage, though it would seem from what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] says that they have been doing this very thing; but surely he must be mistaken. It seems to me incredible that any American judge could have been either so ignorant or corrupt. I sincerely hope that the gentleman has misstated the case.

I presume there never has been an instance in this country where any honest, competent judge has ever determined any question of fact on testimony taken solely ex parte. It might have been done under Jeffries in England, or under the régime of Fouche in France, but in this country, where every man is entitled to a fair and honest disposition of his case before the courts, I pronounce it an outrage upon the administration of justice. It is true, as was stated a little while ago by the gentleman from Ohio, that there are hundreds of instances probably, (many have come within my own knowledge,) where cases have been determined by the southern claims commission solely on testimony of the character indicated by the gentleman from Indiana. There sits on this floor now a member of this House who was once one of these agents. I allude to my colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUK;] and I would like him to state how that system operated. For that purpose I yield him the remainder of my time.

Mr. HOUK. I desire simply to make this statement: I know that the southern claims commission does act upon these ex parte reports. I have in my mind's eye one case, a case that originated in the district of my colleague who has just taken his seat, where I, as the special agent under the claims commission, investigated the case and acted upon ex parte testimony. This claim for about $8,000 that was otherwise established was lost, and I am to-day satisfied if the matter was before me requiring a vote I would vote to pay the claimant that sum of money, because I believe he lost it by the testimony being taken in this ex parte way, men giving testimony that was not exactly true. And therefore I join with my colleague in desiring to see some provision made by which both sides may have a hearing, the claimant as well as the Government.

The question being taken on Mr. BAKER'S amendment, it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, and it was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following paragraph under the head "southern claims commission:"

For contingent expenses, namely: office rent, furniture, fuel, stationery, printing and binding, postage and expressage, labor, and assistance to short-hand reporter when needed, $4,000.

Mr. BRAGG. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "repealed," at the end of line 2064, to and including the word "dollars," at the end of line 2085, and insert as follows:

Sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, of chapter 116 of the law of 1871, approved March —, 1871, are hereby repealed.

Mr. BRAGG. I understand when this bill was placed in its present condition, without an opportunity being allowed for general debate, it was suggested by the gentleman from Ohio that in case amendments were proposed to the bill in addition to the political amendments, or the political legislation rather already reported in the bill, such amendments might properly, with the consent of the House, be laid aside to be disposed of in the discussion which should take place upon the sections providing for political legislation rather than under the rule limiting the debate to five minutes. The amendment which I have proposed to the bill strikes directly at the root of the whole southern claims commission. It proposes to repeal all the machinery by which we authorize gentlemen, at an expense of $40,000, to start a manufactory for the purpose of keeping up this vexed question of southern claims. The propriety of such a repeal is a very grave question, and I presume gentlemen would like to discuss it, and will discuss it with care and consideration. If that should be the disposition of the House I should much prefer that this amendment should go over, to be considered in the discussion which is to follow, rather than it should be disposed of now under the five-minute rule. I ask that consent be given for that purpose.

Mr. ATKINS. As far as I am concerned I see no objection whatever to that suggestion. I think it is likely the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, if discussed now, will probably consume the rest of the day. I, for one, am perfectly willing the subject should be passed over to be taken up hereafter as the gentleman from Wisconsin has suggested.

Mr. KEIFER. We cannot hear what is going on.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] proposes to amend the bill by striking out substantially and in fact the appropriations for the southern claims commission and to repeal the law creating the commission. He proposes that we pass over informally this part of the bill, so that it may be discussed when we take up what is called the political legislation, and that when we consider that, we shall also consider this proposition, as he thinks we probably could not consider the subject this afternoon.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not object to that.

Mr. HOOKER. Do I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to say that the proposition is, that we shall not now discuss the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] wants the matter postponed if it be agreeable to the committee. I would simply say that it would be agreeable to myself.

Mr. HOOKER. I have no objection to any arrangement by which the discussion upon this subject shall be postponed to a future time, but upon the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin I desire to be heard.

Mr. ATKINS. I suggest to the gentleman that it would be better to pass over this portion of the bill informally and take it up hereafter. I would suggest that we get through with the bill and meet on Tuesday for the purpose of considering those portions of it which have been passed over, and that the question of the southern claims commission shall be the first question in order.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair.) The gentleman asks unanimous consent that when the committee meets on Tuesday next, that part of the bill which relates to the southern claims commission shall be first in order.

Mr. BAKER. I must object to that.

Mr. ATKINS. I believe that a large majority of the committee desire that that course shall be taken, and if it be in order I shall make a motion to postpone the consideration of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] a proposition to repeal the law creating the southern claims commission, until we come to consider the bill next week.

The CHAIRMAN. The order of the House is, that all the subjects in the bill save what are known as political subjects shall be considered.

Mr. ATKINS. I see at once that my motion cannot be entertained except by unanimous consent.

Mr. DUNNELL. What stands in the way of our going on with it now?

Mr. ATKINS. Nothing, so far as I am concerned. The gentleman from Wisconsin made the request. He does not want to go on this evening. I suppose he desires to make a speech on his amendment.

Mr. BRAGG. I will state for the benefit of the gentleman from Minnesota that the reason of my application of this favor from the House is that my amendment proposes to repeal the law creating an organization which has existed since 1871. The question is one of gravity and importance, and I desire to discuss it at greater length than it can be discussed under the five-minute rule.

I have no doubt that there are other gentlemen on the floor who desire to discuss that proposition longer than they could be permitted to do under the five-minute rule. My purpose is to show to the committee that contrary to the laws of nations and the laws of war we have been paying a class of claims that we ought not to have paid, which have no legal title for payment, and our payment has been a mere gratuity. I shall then desire to consider whether we are in a condition to be bestowing gratuities and whether, if we do bestow gratuities, it would not be better to bestow what belongs to us rather than as legislators to give away money that belongs to somebody else, and I cannot do it under the five-minute rule.

Mr. WHITE. I call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] to the fact that when we first took up this bill the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] proposed that when we struck a feature of the bill that would excite protracted discussion it should be passed over.

Mr. DUNNELL. That was in regard to political questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] is mistaken.

Mr. WHITE. This is a quasi-political question. If you will refer to the RECORD you will find that the agreement was as I state it.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object to any departure from the arrangement made.

Mr. BRAGG. Unanimous consent was given to my proposition. The objection came to another proposition offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, that this question should be first discussed on Tuesday morning.

Mr. WHITE. I think the gentleman is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, then, will state the proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin, which is that the further consideration of this subject shall be postponed until the other portions of the bill have been disposed of.

Mr. BAKER. I object to any possible method or suggestion for delaying the consideration of this bill beyond what is required by the rules of the committee.

Mr. ATKINS. Then, to accommodate the views of gentlemen, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope the gentleman will ask unanimous consent for the purpose which I suggested to him.

Mr. ATKINS. I had forgotten that. I desire to ask unanimous consent that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole will state to the House when we get into the House the action of the committee on the paragraph proposing to make an appropriation of $25,000 for the purpose of investigating diseased cattle. I now ask unanimous consent that the Chairman may make that statement to the House.

Mr. CARLISLE. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] to put his motion in the form of an instruction to the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to make a partial report from this committee to the House upon that subject.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well; I will put my motion in that form. I move that the Chairman of this Committee of the Whole be instructed to report to the House the action of this committee in reference to cattle diseases.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 102, noes 16.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CARLISLE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CLYMER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon; further, that the committee had instructed him to report to the House that the committee had struck out of the bill the paragraph included in lines 1947 to 1952, and recommended that said paragraph, with sundry amendments submitted thereto, be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, with instructions to report thereon forthwith by bill or otherwise.

The paragraph struck out was as follows:

To pay salaries and traveling and other necessary expenses of inspectors at the different shipping ports of the United States and elsewhere, and for controlling or eradicating infectious and contagious diseases among domesticated animals, $25,000; to be immediately available.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Does that give the Committee on Agriculture the privilege of reporting at any time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does.

Mr. VANCE. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. HURD. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] desire to have the question put upon his motion before the report of the Committee of the Whole has been disposed of?

Mr. VANCE. That is not my purpose. I will withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] to withdraw his motion.

Mr. HURD. I will do so.

The recommendation of the Committee of the Whole was then adopted.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Before the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] renews his motion to adjourn, I ask consent to submit the ordinary resolution in regard to the employment of clerks by committees, so that the committees may proceed to organize.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to designate the committees of this House which are entitled to clerks under the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill making appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1880, and such other committees as in the judgment of said Committee of Accounts should be allowed clerks for the present Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, and to report in part or in full without delay.

Mr. WARNER. That resolution can come in on Monday.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman will not object to it.

Mr. WARNER. I will make no objection.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. VANCE. I now renew the motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. HURD. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. SPRINGER. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 105, nays 109, not voting 72; as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution to print the report of the observations of the transit of Venus, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

The resolution was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CARPENTER. In view of the question that arose in regard to the election of a Senator in New Hampshire, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

No. 408) to amend so much of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1877, as provides for paying mail contractors in the Southern States before the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 409) for the relief of James O. Robertson and Garland S. Ferguson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 410) for the relief of the Mobile Marine Dock Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 416) to establish the judicial district of the Indian Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. A bill to establish a judicial district whether in a Territory or in a State ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Yes, sir, I think it ought to go to that committee.

Mr. INGALLS. It would be more agreeable to me and to the people of my State and to those who are particularly interested in the matter in the Indian Teritory if the bill should take the reference that I suggested.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It provides for the creation of a United States court in a Territory. It strikes me that it should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the order by which this bill was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs be reconsidered?

The motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

WINNEBAGO INDIANS OF WISCONSIN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further business for the morning hour? If not the Senate proceeds to the consideration of its unfinished business, being the bill making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I understand the Senators who expect to address the Senate to-day on that bill prefer not to go on before one o'clock. That being so I ask that No. 3 in the Calendar of general orders be taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. No. 323) for the relief of the Winnebago Indians in Wisconsin, and to aid them to obtain subsistence by agricultural pursuits, and to promote their civilization.

Mr. WITHERS. I did not hear the proposition made by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the proposition. It is that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill just reported, without prejudice to the consideration of the unfinished business at one o'clock.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to state that under the instruction of the Committee on Appropriations I feel it my duty to resist any effort to displace the Army bill, even temporarily, by any other bill. It has been time and again asserted that it was a matter of the most vital moment that the appropriation bills should be passed as promptly as possible; and in order to facilitate their passage I must insist on their retaining their position and that they shall be considered without any further delay.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to know if the bill which the Senator from Wisconsin wishes to take up is a bill reported by a committee?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The bill was introduced during the last session of Congress and was reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs favorably at that time. It was not acted upon by the Senate. I introduced the bill again during this session. The bill was laid on the table at my request, with the understanding that it might be taken up at some time when it was convenient for the Senate in order that I might submit some remarks upon it. I am not anxious to go on this morning. I understand that a Senator who expects to address the Senate to-day on the Army bill does not wish to go on until one o'clock. If any Senator desires to address the Senate at this time on the Army bill, I certainly shall give way at once.

Mr. THURMAN. I have no objection to the bill being taken up for the purpose of the Senate being addressed by the Senator from Wisconsin, but I must insist that the bill shall go to a committee.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I intend to move its reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. THURMAN. I am not entirely unfamiliar with that subject. The bill presents some very grave questions indeed, questions as to the proper interpretation of our treaty with the Winnebagoes, and also some questions in regard to the expenditure of the money we voted some time since to take away about a thousand citizens of the State of Wisconsin and transport them west of the Mississippi against their consent. I shall insist that the bill go to the Committee on Indian Affairs whenever it is taken up.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I shall agree to that, certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin withdraw his motion?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If there is no objection, I will proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection that the Senator from Wisconsin may proceed until one o'clock.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, this bill was introduced by me in the last Congress after consultation with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and it meets with his approval. Late in the last session it was favorably reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, but for want of time no action was had upon it in the Senate.

The bill is drawn with a preamble for the purpose in part of setting forth the facts out of which the necessity for the legislation proposed arises. Section 15 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1875, reads as follows:

SEC. 15. That any Indian born in the United States, who is the head of a family, or who has arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and who has abandoned, or or may hereafter abandon, his tribal relations, shall, on making satisfactory proof of such abandonment, under rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, be entitled to the benefits of the act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1862, and the acts amendatory thereof, except that the provisions of the eighth section of the said act shall not be held to apply to entries made under this act: Provided, however, That the title to lands acquired by any Indian by virtue hereof shall not be subject to alienation or incumbrance, either by voluntary conveyance or the judgment, decree, or order of any court, and shall be and remain inalienable for a period of five years from the date of the patent issued therefor: Provided, That any such Indian shall be entitled to his distributive share of all annuities, tribal funds, lands, and other property, the same as though he had maintained his tribal relations; and any transfer, alienation, or incumbrance of any interest he may hold or claim by reason of his former tribal relations shall be void.

Two hundred and thirty-six heads of families of the Wisconsin Winnebagoes have abandoned their tribal relations and have already taken homesteads in that State under this act. Many more have signified their desire and purpose to abandon their tribal relations, and adopt the habits and customs of civilized people and avail themselves of the benefits of this act, but are unable to do so on account of their extreme poverty. These Indians who have thus abandoned their ancient tribal relations, broken away from the customs and traditions of their ancestors, taken homesteads and become cultivators of the soil, now desire among other things to secure the payment to them of certain funds in the Treasury of the United States to their credit. They also desire that an account be stated, adjusted, and settled by the Interior Department between themselves and that portion of the tribe now residing on the reservation in the State of Nebraska. They desire also that hereafter in the distribution of the annuities of the tribe a pro rata division shall be made to that portion of the tribe in Wisconsin and that portion in Nebraska.

In order to arrive at a correct understanding of the matter, and with a view of securing what I deem necessary legislation in regard to these Indians, I desire to lay before the Senate that portion of their tribal history connected with the funds of the Wisconsin band and of the tribe in general.

The Winnebagoes were formerly a very powerful people. By a treaty concluded between the United States and the Winnebagoes and other tribes at Prairie du Chien, on the 19th day of August, 1825, the boundaries of the Winnebago country were defined and agreed upon. The boundaries fixed by this treaty embraced one-half of the present State of Wisconsin and nearly one-third of Illinois. A large portion of the Winnebago lands in Wisconsin were ceded to the United States by a treaty made September 15, 1832. The United States in part payment for the lands thus acquired ceded to the Indians an extensive tract of country west of the Mississippi River, then known as the "neutral land," and situate between the country of the Sioux on the north and the Sac and Fox tribes of Indians on the south.

By various other treaties on and prior to June 15, 1838, the Winnebagoes conveyed to the United States all of their lands east of the Mississippi River. By the treaty of June 15, 1838, the United States reassured to the Winnebagoes that tract of country west of the Mississippi known as the "neutral land," and to which a claim in their behalf attached under the treaty of September 15, 1832.

By a subsequent treaty contracted October 13, 1846, the title of the Winnebagoes to the "neutral lands" was extinguished, and in part consideration thereof they were given a tract of land on the Saint Peter's River in Minnesota, estimated to contain 897,900 acres. Their title to this magnificent tract was extinguished by the treaty of February 27, 1855, and in full payment for the same the United States agreed to give them $70,000, and to grant them as a permanent home a tract of land equal to eighteen miles square on the Blue Earth River, in one of the most beautiful and fertile regions in Minnesota. When the Winnebagoes agreed to the treaty of 1855 they were assured by the representatives of the Government—and they in their simplicity believed—that their wanderings were over and that they had finally reached the promised land, which was henceforth to be to them a haven of rest. They moved on to the Blue Earth reservation, erected dwellings, and opened farms; but in this their new home they were soon pressed upon all sides by the whites, who eagerly clamored for these rich Indian lands. So urgent was the desire of the white settlers to possess these lands that the Indians were actually coerced into making the treaty of April 15, 1859. By this treaty it was provided that, in order to aid in the civilization of the Indians, townships 106 and 107, in ranges 24 and 25, and the two strips of land immediately adjoining on the east and north, within their reservation, should be allotted in severalty to the members of the tribe, and that the remainder of their lands should be sold and the proceeds applied to their benefit. Under these provisions allotments in severalty were made in 1861 and certificates therefor issued to the Indians entitled to the same. At the outbreak of the late civil war a large number of Winnebagoes enlisted in the Army and served faithfully and efficiently until honorably discharged or killed.

During the Sioux outbreak of 1862 the Winnebagoes maintained the most friendly relations with the whites. The lands occupied by these Indians were very rich and valuable and very desirably located for settlement. The Sioux outrages had the effect of strongly exasperating the whites in Minnesota, not only against the Sioux but against Indians in general, and they did not stop to inquire very closely whether they were hostile or friendly. Urged on by these motives and feelings, the white settlers commenced a series of encroachments, wrongs, and outrages against the Winnebagoes, which finally rendered their condition so unsafe that the Government thought it necessary to remove the tribe from the State. An act was accordingly passed by Congress on the 21st of February, 1863, (12 Statutes at Large, page 658,) providing for their removal to a reservation beyond the limits of any State. A reservation was selected at Usher's Landing, on the Missouri River, in Dakota, to which the Indians were removed in the summer of 1863. The consent of the Indians to this legislation was not obtained, nor was it asked. The new reservation in Dakota was not selected by the Indians, but by the United States. On account of the proximity of this new reservation to the Sioux, who were hostile to the Winnebagoes, and for other causes, the Winnebagoes became greatly dissatisfied, and large numbers of them returned to the States, about one thousand of whom settled in Wisconsin. The remainder of the tribe were gathered together and settled upon a reservation in Nebraska, where they now are.

Arising from these various treaties the Winnebagoes as a tribe have a fund of $883,249.58 in the Treasury of the United States, the income from which, at 5 per cent. interest per annum, is by treaty provision to be distributed to them in cash or supplies, as the President may direct.

By act of June 25, 1864, (13 Stats., page 172,) it was provided, and I think very justly, "that the proportion of annuities to which the stray bands of Winnebago Indians would be entitled if on their reservation should be retained in the Treasury to their credit from year to year, to be paid to them when they shall reunite with their tribe, or to be used by the Secretary of the Interior * * * in settling and subsisting them on any other reservation which might thereafter be provided for them."

This statute is mandatory. It directs that the proportion of annuities to which these stray bands would be entitled if they were on their reservation should be retained in the Treasury to the credit of these stray bands; but for some reason, not known to the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, no steps were taken under this act to create a reserve fund for these stray bands, all of whom are in Wisconsin, until 1876, when by order of the then Secretary of the Interior, the present Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER,] their estimated proportion of $\frac{1000}{2531}$ of the tribal annuities was, and has since been, retained in the Treasury for them. This reserve fund at the present time amounts to $48,249.17, and it is now in the Treasury awaiting directory action by Congress. The total annuities of the tribe from 1864, when the Wisconsin bands separated themselves from the remainder of the tribe, then on the reservation in Dakota, to 1875, both years inclusive, amount to $641,312.78, all of which, with the exception I will mention hereafter, has been paid to the Winnebagoes of Nebraska.

On the basis adopted by Secretary CHANDLER of $\frac{1000}{2531}$, the share of the Wisconsin band would have been $253,383.12.

In the years 1873 and 1874 about nine hundred of the Wisconsin Winnebagoes were removed by the United States from their homes in Wisconsin to the tribal reservation in Nebraska. They were very much opposed to being removed, but the Government sent a detachment of soldiers to Wisconsin to aid in effecting the removal. The Indians were gathered together by force and compelled to go to Nebraska. The Wisconsin Winnebagoes were very much dissatisfied with their new home in Nebraska, and within a few months all of them except two hundred and four, together with a considerable number of the Nebraska Indians, returned to Wisconsin, where they now are. The number of Winnebagoes now in Wisconsin is about one thousand.

There was expended in the removal of the Wisconsin band to Nebraska, for their subsistence, and in the purchase of lands for them and making improvements thereon, the sum of $154,624.49, and there was retained to be expended in settling them on their lands in Nebraska the sum of $26,131.13; this latter sum, together with the sum of $30,868.87 paid out in the purchase of lands and $16,718.75 expended in the erection of houses, making a total of $73,718.75, has inured to the benefit of the Nebraska Winnebagoes.

Out of the sum of $253,385.12 to which the Wisconsin Winnebagoes are entitled under the act of 1864, they have had $107,036.87 which is properly chargeable against them, leaving a balance of $146,346.25 actually due to the Wisconsin band under the act of 1864, all of which, as I have already remarked, has been paid to the Winnebagoes in Nebraska.

The Wisconsin band ought not in equity and good conscience to be charged with the expense of their forced removal to Nebraska in 1873 and 1874; but the Interior Department insists upon it and I assent to it by the bill now under consideration. The Indians will assent to it also.

During the year 1872 $100,000 of the principal fund of the tribe was withdrawn from the Treasury and paid to the Winnebagoes in Nebraska. There is now in the Treasury to the credit of the tribe, accruing under treaty stipulations for the fiscal year 1873 and prior years, the sum of $40,406.42, from which a sufficient amount should be withdrawn and paid to the Wisconsin band to equalize the above payment of $100,000 made to the Nebraska portion of the tribe.

The apportionment of annuity moneys between the Nebraska and Wisconsin bands last year was as follows:

To the Nebraska Winnebagoes	$29,260 68
To the Wisconsin Winnebagoes	14,901 79

I think this proportion is unjust to the Wisconsin band, but it can only be corrected when an accurate census of the tribe has been taken, which I provide for in this bill.

It is only just toward the Wisconsin band that measures should be taken for the payment to them of the $48,249.17 now in the Treasury belonging to them, together with the sums heretofore mentioned by me in equalization of the payments to the two bands. This bill does not propose any reduction of the principal fund of the tribe; that is to remain intact.

It will be observed that the bill authorizes the Interior Department to withhold from the Nebraska Winnebagoes a certain proportion of their annuity moneys each year and pay the same to the Wisconsin band until the latter shall have been refunded the amount due them under the act of 1864. The justice of this provision must be apparent to every one who gives the subject any thought whatever.

The Nebraska band have had nearly a million dollars expended for their benefit in the last fourteen years; now justice ought to be done to their brothers of the Wisconsin band, and it can be done without serious detriment to the Nebraska band.

Under the provisions of this bill substantial justice will be done to both bands, and, as already remarked, the principal of the tribal fund will not be decreased.

From the best information I am able to obtain, I am of the opinion that two-thirds of the heads of families of the Wisconsin band have taken homesteads under the act of March 3, 1875, and believe that nearly all of the remainder will soon avail themselves of the benefit of the homestead laws in the event that this bill becomes a law and they are thus provided with the necessary pecuniary means. The settlement of the Wisconsin band upon homesteads under the provisions of the act of 1875 is, in legal effect, a division of the tribe, necessitating a census of the same for the purpose of effecting a proper and equitable division in the future of the annuities between the two bands.

In conclusion, I will say a word in regard to the present condition of the Wisconsin Winnebagoes who have taken homesteads. Some time ago I received a memorial addressed to Congress and signed by about seventy-five of these Indians. They state in this memorial that they have abandoned their tribal relations and complied with the provisions of the act authorizing them to take and settle upon homesteads; and they ask Congress to assure to them their pro rata share of the income arising from the tribal fund. The homesteads taken by these memorialists are situate in Jackson County, Wisconsin, near the village of Black River Falls, and about sixty miles from my place of residence.

I have received numerous letters from leading citizens of Northwestern Wisconsin touching the condition and conduct of these Indians since they abandoned their tribal relations. Under date of November 13, 1877, Mr. Dudley J. Spaulding, of Black River Falls, who is a leading business man in that locality and a gentleman of the highest character, wrote me as follows:

> The settlement of Winnebago Indians near here is orderly and sober—more so than any equal number of white men that can be found. I have not heard of such a thing as stealing among them. Their principal men do not touch liquor at all, and do all they can to dissuade others from using it. I do not know exactly the number that have made improvements on their homesteads, but quite a good many have. They have also built themselves quite a good school-house, and have had three months of school this year. The number of persons in families taking homesteads is about four hundred. About one hundred homesteads have been taken by them in this county. I am informed that quite a number of homesteads have also been taken by them near Grand Rapids and Portage. These Indians are self-supporting—not beggars nor paupers.

Mr. John Parsons, of Black River Falls, who is now, and for many years past has been, postmaster at that village, and who is a man of the highest respectability, wrote me under date of December 6, 1877:

> Ninety-six Winnebagoes have taken homesteads in this county and about one hundred in adjoining counties. Of the ninety-six homesteads taken in this county fifty-one have log houses built on them. They have also built a school-house. These Indians are sober and industrious.

Hon. C. R. Johnson, also of Black River Falls, a prominent lawyer and a highly respectable and influential citizen, wrote to me on the 29th of November last:

> At the personal request of Winneshiek, an old-time chief of the Winnebagoes, I send you the following statement relative to the condition and prospects of that branch of the tribe settled in this county, and would state, to start with, that their tribal relations are done away with entirely; each family is a community by itself, and as a general thing they have assumed the style of dress used by the whites. Last summer a school was kept up among them from funds raised among themselves; another term of school is to commence in a few days.

It will be seen from these communications that these Indians are making an earnest effort to take care of themselves. They have made considerable progress, and have made it without any aid from the Government. They are equitably entitled to their pro rata share of the tribal fund. The object of this bill is to secure such equitable share to them.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator if this bill has been submitted to the chiefs and head men of the Nebraska tribes, and if he knows whether these provisions are satisfactory to them?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am not aware that the bill has been submitted to them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WITHERS. Regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read section 7 of the bill.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state that the sixth section was the section under consideration at the time of adjournment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands there are no amendments pending to that section.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] offered an amendment, I thought, to the sixth section. I may be mistaken in that, however.

Mr. BLAINE. The amendment I submitted is to the sixth section. The arrangement understood in the committee, and somewhat I believe announced in the Senate, was that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] who has charge of the bill, after addressing the Senate would be followed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] and I was to follow him. That was the arrangement made I believe and handed to the Vice-President.

Mr. WITHERS. Of course it is not for me to say what the understanding of the Senator was or of the committee. The bill having been placed in my charge I have deemed it proper in the exercise of the discretion which is usually vested in the Senator occupying the position I do, to take such action as in my opinion would most facilitate the passage of the bill. Therefore I did not propose to inaugurate an extended and general political discussion upon the provisions of the Army bill, and I propose to do now with regard to the sixth section as I have done in regard to the preceding sections, that is, make any explanation which may be required or desired by Senators who wish and seek an explanation, and consider the bill purely in its business aspect.

Mr. BLAINE. Do I understand from the honorable Senator, then, that he is not going to debate the measure?

Mr. WITHERS. I am ready to go on with the bill and vote upon it without any further discussion, if it be desirable.

Mr. BLAINE. It is the intention, then, Mr. President, of the side of the Chamber represented by the Senator not to debate the bill?

Mr. WITHERS. The design is precisely as I have expressed it. The bill suits the Committee on Appropriations. They have reported it to the Senate and recommend its passage. They feel no desire to do more than to vote on the objections as they are presented, provided that course shall meet with the general wish of the Senate. At the same time I will say that we do not propose, so far as I am advised, to throw any obstruction or impediment in the way of a discussion if Senators desire to debate the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator will do me the justice, however, to say that the arrangement was otherwise as between the members of the Committee on Appropriations, and that on Friday, when the Senate adjourned over, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] was waiting impatiently to take the floor.

Mr. WITHERS. I cannot assent to the proposition that the Committee on Appropriations made any arrangement as to how this bill was to be considered. Individual members of that committee may have expressed a desire to address the Senate upon the subject, and possibly in a particular order, but the Committee on Appropriations certainly took no action in the premises.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course they took no action, but the understanding was spoken of and laid before the Vice-President, that the honorable Senator who has charge of the bill should first address the Senate if he chose, to be followed by the Senator from Pennsylvania on that side of the Chamber, and he in turn to be followed by myself. I had no information whatever until coming here this morning that the arrangement was changed.

I ask that the sixth section of the printed bill as it stands be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 6. That section 2002 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:
> "No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States: Provided, That nothing contained in this section, as now amended, shall be held or deemed to abridge or affect the duty or power of the President of the United States, under section 5297 of the Revised Statutes, enacted under and to enable the United States to comply with section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, on application of the Legislature or executive, as provided for in said section."
> And that section 5528 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:
> "Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine regard his amendment as pending to the sixth section?

Mr. BLAINE. I will now offer it, to come in at the close of section 6. My remarks will not be especially directed to that amendment, but I will formally offer it now, to be added at the close of the section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of section 6 the following:

> And any military, naval, or civil officer, or any other person, who shall, except for the purposes herein named, appear armed with a deadly weapon of any description, either concealed or displayed, within a mile of any polling place where a general or special election for Representative to Congress is being held, shall, on conviction, be punished with a fine not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or with imprisonment for a period not less than six months nor more than five years, or with both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the existing section of the Revised Statutes numbered 2002 reads thus:

> No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace at the polls.

The object of the proposed section which has just been read at the Clerk's desk is to get rid of the eight closing words, namely, "or to keep the peace at the polls," and therefore the mode of legislation proposed in the Army bill now before the Senate is an unusual mode; it is an extraordinary mode. If you want to take off a single sentence at the end of a section in the Revised Statutes the ordinary way is to strike out those words, but the mode chosen in this bill is to repeat and re-enact the whole section leaving those few words out. While I do not wish to be needlessly suspicious on a small point I am quite persuaded that this did not happen by accident but that it came by design. If I may so speak it came of cunning, the intent being to create the impression that whereas the republicans in the administration of the General Government had been using troops right and left, hither and thither, in every direction, as soon as the democrats got power they enacted this section. I can imagine democratic candidates for Congress all over the country reading this section to gaping and listening audiences as one of the first offsprings of democratic reform, whereas every word of it, every syllable of it, from its first to its last, is the enactment of a republican Congress.

I repeat that this unusual form presents a dishonest issue, whether so intended or not. It presents the issue that as soon as the democrats get possession of the Federal Government they intended to enact the clause which is thus embraced. The law was passed by a republican Congress in 1865. There were forty-six Senators sitting in this Chamber at the time, of whom only ten or at most eleven were democrats. The House of Representatives was overwhelmingly republican. We were in the midst of a war. The republican administration had a million or possibly twelve hundred thousand bayonets at its command. Thus circumstanced and thus surrounded, with the amplest possible power to interfere with elections had they so designed, with soldiers in every hamlet and county of the United States, the republican party themselves placed that provision on the statute-book, and Abraham Lincoln, their President, signed it.

I beg you to observe, Mr. President, that this is the first instance in the legislation of the United States in which any restrictive clause whatever was put upon the statute-book in regard to the use of troops at the polls. The republican party did it with the Senate and the House in their control. Abraham Lincoln signed it when he was Commander-in-Chief of an army larger than ever Napoleon Bonaparte had at his command. So much by way of correcting an ingenious and studied attempt at misrepresentation.

The alleged object is to strike out the few words that authorize the use of troops to keep peace at the polls. This country has been alarmed, I rather think indeed amused, at the great effort made to create a widespread impression that the republican party relies for its popular strength upon the use of the bayonet. This democratic Congress has attempted to give a bad name to this country throughout the civilized world and to give it on a false issue. They have raised an issue that has no foundation in fact, that is false in whole and detail, false in the charge, false in all the specifications. That impression sought to be created, as I say, not only throughout the North American continent but in Europe to-day, is that elections are attempted in this country to be controlled by the bayonet.

I denounce it here as a false issue. I am not at liberty to say that any gentleman making the issue knows it to be false; I hope he does not; but I am going to prove to him that it is false, and that there is not a solitary inch of solid earth on which to rest the foot of any man that makes that issue. I have in my hand an official transcript of the location and the number of all the troops of the United States east of Omaha. By "east of Omaha," I mean all the United States east of the Mississippi River and that belt of States that border the Mississippi River on the west, including forty-one million at least out of the forty-five million people that this country is supposed to contain to-day. In that magnificent area, I will not pretend to state its extent, but with forty-one million people, how many troops of the United States are there to-day? Would any Senator on the opposite side like to guess, or would he like to state how many men with muskets in their hands there are in the vast area I have named? There are two thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven! And not one more.

From the headwaters of the Mississippi River to the lakes, and down the great chain of lakes, and down the Saint Lawrence and down the valley of the Saint John and down the Saint Croix striking the Atlantic Ocean and following it down to Key West, around the Gulf, up to the mouth of the Mississippi again, a frontier of eight thousand miles either bordering on the ocean or upon foreign territory is guarded by these troops. Within this domain forty-five fortifications are manned and eleven arsenals protected. There are sixty troops to every million of people. In the South I have the entire number in each State. I believe the Senator from Delaware is alarmed, greatly alarmed about the overriding of the popular ballot by troops of the United States! In Delaware there is not a single armed man, not one. The United States has not even one soldier in the State.

The honorable Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] on Friday last lashed himself into a passion, or at least into a perspiration, over the wrongs of his State, trodden down by the iron heel of military despotism. There is not a solitary man of the United States uniformed on the soil of West Virginia, and there has not been for years.

In Maryland. I do not know whether my esteemed friend from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] has been greatly alarmed or not; but at Fort McHenry, guarding the entrance to the beautiful harbor of his beautiful city, there are one hundred and ninety-two artillery-men located.

In Virginia there is a school of practice at Fortress Monroe. My honorable friend who has charge of this bill [Mr. WITHERS] knows very well, if he does not I will tell him, that outside of that school of practice at Fortress Monroe, which has two hundred and eighty-two men in it, there is not a Federal soldier on the soil of Virginia—not one.

North Carolina. Are the Senators from that State alarmed at the immediate and terrible prospect of being overrun by the Army of the United States? On the whole soil of North Carolina there are but thirty soldiers guarding a fort at the mouth of Cape Fear River—just thirty.

South Carolina. I do not see a Senator on the floor from that State. There are one hundred and twenty artillerymen guarding the approaches to Charleston Harbor and not another soldier on her soil.

Georgia. Does my gallant friend from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] who knows better than I the force and strength of military organization, the senior Senator, and the junior also—are both or either of those Senators alarmed at the presence of twenty-nine soldiers in Georgia? [Laughter.] There are just twenty-nine there.

Florida has one hundred and eighty-two at three separate posts, principally guarding the navy-yard near which my friend on the opposite side [Mr. JONES] lives.

Tennessee. Is the honorable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAILEY] alarmed at the progress of military despotism in his State. There is not a single Federal soldier on the soil of Tennessee—not one.

Kentucky. I see both the honorable Senators from Kentucky here. They have equal cause with Tennessee to be alarmed for there is not a Federal soldier in Kentucky,—not one!

Missouri. Not one.

Arkansas. Fifty-seven in Arkansas.

Alabama. I think my friend from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is greatly excited over this question, and in his State there are thirty-two Federal soldiers located at an arsenal of the United States.

Mississippi. The great State of Mississippi, that is in danger of being trodden under the iron hoof of military power, has not a Federal soldier on its soil.

Louisiana has two hundred and thirty-nine.

Texas, apart from the regiments that guard the frontier on the Rio Grande and the Indian frontier, has not one.

And the entire South has eleven hundred and fifty-five soldiers to intimidate, overrun, oppress, and destroy the liberties of fifteen million people! In the Southern States there are twelve hundred and three counties. If you distribute the soldiers there is not quite one for each county; and when I give the counties I give them from the census of 1870. If you distribute them territorially there is one for every seven hundred square miles of territory, so that if you make a territorial distribution, I would remind the honorable Senator from Delaware, if I saw him in his seat, that the quota for his State would be three, "one ragged sergeant and two abreast," as the old song has it. [Laughter.] That is the force ready to destroy the liberties of Delaware!

Mr. President, it was said, as the old maxim has it, that the soothsayers of Rome could not look each other in the face without smiling. There are not two democratic Senators on that side who can go into the cloak-room and look each other in the face without smiling at this talk, or more appropriately I should say without blushing, the whole thing is such a prodigious and absolute farce, such a miserably manufactured false issue, such a pretense without the slightest foundation in the world, and talked about most and denounced the loudest in States that have not and have not had a single Federal soldier. In New England we have three hundred and eighty soldiers. Throughout the South it does not run quite seventy to the million people. In New England we have absolutely one hundred and twenty soldiers to the million. New England is far more overrun to-day by the Federal soldier, immensely more than the whole South is. I never heard anybody complain about it in New England or express any very great fear of their liberties being endangered by the presence of a handful of troops.

As I have said, the tendency of this talk is to give us a bad name in Europe. Republican institutions are looked upon there with jealousy. Every misrepresentation, every slander is taken up and exaggerated and talked about to our discredit, and the democratic party of the country to-day stand indicted, and I here indict them, for public slander of their country, creating the impression in the civilized world that we are governed by a ruthless military despotism. I wonder how amazing it would be to any man in Europe, familiar as Europeans are with great armies, if he were told that over a territory larger than France and Spain and Portugal and Great Britain and Holland and Belgium and the German Empire all combined, there were but eleven hundred and fifty-five soldiers! That is all this democratic howl, this mad cry, this false issue, this absurd talk is based on—the presence of eleven hundred and fifty-five soldiers on eight hundred and fifty thousand square miles of territory, not double the number of the democratic police in the city of Baltimore, not a third of the police in the city of New York, not double the democratic police in the city of New Orleans. I repeat, the number indicts them, it stamps the whole cry as without any foundation, it derides the issue as a false and scandalous and partisan makeshift.

What, then, is the real motive underlying this movement? Senators on that side, democratic orators on the stump cannot make any sensible set of men at the cross-roads believe that they are afraid of eleven hundred and fifty-five soldiers distributed one to each county in the South. The minute you state that everybody sees the utter, palpable and laughable absurdity of it, and therefore we must go further and find a motive for all this cry. We want to find out, to use a familiar and vulgar phrase, what is "the cat under the meal." It is not the troops. That is evident. There are more troops by 50 per cent. scattered through the Northern States east of the Mississippi to-day than through the Southern States east of the Mississippi, and yet nobody there speaks of it; everybody would be laughed at for speaking of it; and therefore the issue, I take no risk in stating, I make bold to declare, that this issue on the troops, being a false one, being one without foundation, conceals the true issue, which is simply to get rid of the Federal presence at Federal elections, to get rid of the civil power of the United States in the election of Representatives to the Congress of the United States. That is the whole of it; and disguise it as you may there is nothing else in it or of it.

You simply want to get rid of the supervision by the Federal Government of the election of Representatives to Congress through civil means; and therefore this bill connects itself directly with another bill, and you cannot discuss this military bill without discussing a bill which we had before us last winter, known as the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I am quite well aware, I profess to be as well aware as any one, that it is not permissible for me to discuss a bill that is pending before the other House. I am quite well aware that propriety and parliamentary rule forbid that I should speak of what is done in the House of Representatives; but I know very well that I am not forbidden to speak of that which is not done in the House of Representatives. I am quite free to speak of the things that are not done there, and therefore I am free to declare that neither this military bill nor the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill ever emanated from any committee of the House of Representatives at all; they are not the work of any committee of the House of Representatives, and, although the present House of Representatives is almost evenly balanced in party division, there has been allowed no solitary suggestion to come from the minority of that House in regard to the shaping of these bills. Where do they come from? We are not left to infer; we are not even left to the Yankee privilege of guessing, because we know. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] obligingly told us—I have his exact words here—"that the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] was the chairman of a committee appointed by the democratic party to see how it was best to present all these questions before us." Therefore when I discuss these two bills together I am violating no parliamentary law, I am discussing the offspring and the creation of the democratic caucus of which the Senator from Ohio whom I do not see in his seat is the chairman.

Mr. WITHERS. I would ask the Senator if this bill was presented to the Senate by the democratic caucus?

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir.

Mr. WITHERS. I would also ask if it was not reported by the grand Committee of the Whole, the highest committee of all committees, to the House of Representatives by a majority?

Mr. BLAINE. Now you are asking me to tell what the House did. I would not do that, because that is against parliamentary law. [Laughter.]

Mr. WITHERS. It is probably against policy.

Mr. BLAINE. No, against parliamentary law. I will not discuss what the House is doing at all. The Senator cannot lead me into that. When he speaks about its being before a committee here, that is true.

Mr. WITHERS. I wanted merely to say that I do not regard it as an improper suggestion and in view of the broad declaration made by the Senator from Maine both as to this bill and the other bill, of which the Senate has no knowledge but which I see he proposes to debate—I cannot blame him for it; I cannot find any objection particularly that he should drag in another bill in order to hang a speech upon it; I have no objection to that. But in view of the declaration that it was not reported by any committee, I simply wished to call attention to the fact that it was reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator asked me if it was not referred to a committee in this branch. Does the Senator wish me to answer that question whether this bill I am discussing before the Senate now was before the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator can consult his own pleasure in regard to the matter.

Mr. BLAINE. I suppose the Senator asked me what was done. I will not speak of what took place in the Committee on Appropriations, but I think the Senate can infer what took place there from what took place in the Senate Chamber last Friday, when in solid phalanx the other side would not allow even a grammatical mistake to be corrected; and I repeat that up to this time no committee of either branch of Congress has exercised the slightest discretion whatever upon this bill or been permitted to do so in either branch of Congress.

Mr. WITHERS. I entirely dissent from the statement. Of course it is not proper for either the Senator or I to disclose what passed in the committee-room, but I deny utterly the accuracy of the statement.

Mr. BLAINE. This bill came from the democratic caucus committee. It went to the House of Representatives. What took place there I will not speak of. It came here; it went into the Committee on Appropriations of this body. What took place there I will not speak of; but I know it came back here without dotting an i or crossing a t. If there is any inference to be made——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator whether he was not on a subcommittee to consider the Army bill, the very bill which he has now in his hand.

Mr. BLAINE. I was a member of that subcommittee. The honorable Senator did me the honor to appoint me upon it; that is true; and I believe there is no impropriety in my speaking of what a subcommittee did. We sat on that bill, and we were never permitted to make any change in it whatever, not the slightest in the world.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator tell me why he was not permitted?

Mr. BLAINE. You ask me the secrets of the democratic prison-house, why I was not permitted? I do not know. That is for you to tell. I want you to tell me why I was not permitted.

Mr. WITHERS. Because you did not have enough support.

Mr. BLAINE. Because I was outvoted.

Mr. WITHERS. That is the whole thing.

Mr. BLAINE. Two to one.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator said no opportunity was offered for any modification or amendment. It was from that statement I dissented; and I wish to call his attention to the fact that the broad way in which he has stated it cannot be sustained by the facts within his own knowledge.

Mr. BLAINE. Now I really get at the point made by the Senator.

Mr. WITHERS. The majority only exercised that control over the bill which they have always the right to do.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator has told so much now that he really forces me to tell more, and that more is that when I offered several amendments in the subcommittee they said "we really agree to these, and if we permit the bill to be altered at all we will let these in, but we do not intend to let this bill be touched." That was what was said in our committee. They did not object to several suggestions I made in regard to amendments to the bill, but they simply sat and voted me down. That is the reason why I could not amend it.

Now, Mr. President, I say you cannot possibly debate one of these bills without debating the other, because when you come to read this new section 2002 in the military bill it is to prevent any civil officer of the United States being present on election day. I am not now talking about military officers; there is not a Senator on that side of the Chamber who ever saw a military force at the polls, in my judgment.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to say in that connection——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I will yield for testimony on that point.

Mr. HEREFORD. The Senator in making the assertion that he has made is not only assuming to himself the power of omniscience, but ubiquity, that he at all times has been at all the polls——

Mr. BLAINE. Do not delay on that. Tell me if you ever saw any body there?

Mr. HEREFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. That is what I want to know.

Mr. HEREFORD. Prior to the time that the State of West Virginia passed from under the control of the republican party we always had the military there, and I have seen them at the polls making arrests on the day of voting in my own town.

Mr. BLAINE. When?

Mr. HEREFORD. When?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, when did you ever see a military man in the uniform of the United States making arrests at the polls?

Mr. HEREFORD. I have known of them making arrests in Mercer County.

Mr. BLAINE. When?

Mr. HEREFORD. If you stop a moment, I can look back and think.

Mr. BLAINE. I want to know when?

Mr. HEREFORD. In 1870, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. Ten years ago?

Mr. HEREFORD. About that.

Mr. BLAINE. Or before that?

Mr. HEREFORD. It was after the war. I saw this: we had a company of soldiers stationed in the town where I lived within one hundred steps of the voting place, and that company on the day of election were divided up, a part of them sent to an adjoining county, the county of Mercer, where they expected to control the voters.

Mr. BLAINE. One company!

Mr. HEREFORD. And were placed there within seventy yards of the place of voting.

Mr. BLAINE. What did they arrest anybody for?

Mr. HEREFORD. For the purpose of intimidation.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, yes!

Mr. HEREFORD. For the purpose of intimidation.

Mr. BLAINE. I should be glad to hear any other testimony on that side.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can tell the honorable Senator that I saw soldiers marched into the public square and stack their arms, since the war.

Mr. BLAINE. What time since the war?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Eighteen hundred and sixty-five.

Mr. BLAINE. That is a good while ago, and Kentucky was in a condition of upheaval about that time, 1865.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I know from information that they were stationed at a number of polls in other portions of the State.

Mr. BLAINE. Has the Senator seen any since that time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. This I saw with my own eyes. I saw men go up in the presence of soldiers to vote.

Mr. BLAINE. Has the Senator seen any since 1865.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator then has had fourteen years to brood over that, and he cannot stand it a minute longer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The power to put them there is still in the law; and it is to deprive the President of the authority to take them to the polls for which we now contend.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator tells us that he is particularly sensitive about what he saw when the country was still in a disturbed condition fourteen years ago, while to-day there is not and has not been for years a solitary Federal soldier in Kentucky, not one. That is his testimony. Has any other Senator a statement to make?

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator will recollect that he denied that any Senator on this side of the Chamber had ever seen a soldier at the polls.

Mr. BLAINE. No; I queried it; I did not deny it.

Mr. WITHERS. I understood the Senator to make the statement broadly.

Mr. BLAINE. I was not so broadly ubiquitous as the honorable Senator from West Virginia supposed. I wanted to know whether any Senator there would rise up and say he had seen it.

Mr. WITHERS. I am willing to abide by the reporter's record of the remarks of the Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. If I made a slip of the tongue I will gladly correct it. I could not be at every polling place in the South. There are thirteen thousand polling places in the South, and there are eleven hundred and fifty-five soldiers down there, and this great intimidation is to be carried on by one soldier distributing himself around to twelve polling places. That is the intimidation that threatens the South just now; and I am just reminded by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] that the Supreme Court decided—a fact I did not recall at the moment—that the war did not close till April, 1866; a state of peace had not come, and therefore the honorable Senator from Kentucky does not bring himself within the line of evidence. He only saw troops there in 1865, during the war. Has he seen them since April, 1866, in time of peace?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No.

Mr. BLAINE. He has not. [Laughter.] Then I should like some other Senator, if there is any one that has any testimony to give; I should like some other Senator that has seen troops around the polls bulldozing and browbeating and intimidating and controlling the popular wish, to rise if he has any testimony to give on the subject.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, perhaps I can make a statement about soldiers in Kentucky in 1865 myself. I happened to be in Louisville in 1865 at the time of an election for Congress when General Rousseau was a candidate for Representative in Congress. I was stationed at Louisville and had sixty-five thousand soldiers under my command. I was there on the day of the election and I made a speech there the night before the election. Those sixty-five thousand soldiers were stationed all around Louisville, and I never saw a more quiet, peaceable election in my life, and under orders the soldiers were kept from the polls and out of the city during the day of the election, under my own orders.

Mr. BLAINE. All we get then in the testimony is that the Senator from Kentucky says he saw troops in his State during the war, and the Senator from West Virginia says he saw them in his State once since the war—ten years ago. That is the amount of actual testimony we get on the subject. Now, Mr. President, I say this bill connects itself directly with the provisions which are inserted by the democratic caucus in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill. The two stand together; they cannot be separated; because if to-day we enact that no civil officer whatever shall appear under any circumstances with armed men at the polls—I am not speaking of Federal troops or military or naval officers; I should like to know how, if you strike that out to-day in the military bill that is pending, you are going to enforce any provisions of the election laws even if we leave them standing. Take this section of the election law, section 2024 of the Revised Statutes:

> The marshal or his general deputies, or such special deputies as are thereto specially empowered by him, in writing, and under his hand and seal, whenever he or either or any of them is forcibly resisted in executing their duties under this title, or shall, by violence, threats, or menaces, be prevented from executing such duties, or from arresting any person who has committed any offense for which the marshal or his general or his special deputies are authorized to make such arrest, are, and each of them is, empowered to summon and call to his aid the bystanders or posse comitatus of his district.

I should like any one to tell me whether a marshal can call together armed men under that if you repeal this section in the military bill. Under heavy penalties you say that no civil officer whatever, no matter what the disturbances, at an election of Representatives to Congress—no civil officer of the United States shall keep order. You do not say that in that same election the State officer may not be there with all the force he chooses, legal or illegal. You say that the United States in an election which specially concerns the Federal Government shall not have anything whatever to do with it. That is what you say, although the Constitution, as broadly as language can express it, gives the Government of the United States, if it chooses to exercise it, the absolute control of the whole subject,—familiar to school-boys who have even once read the Constitution in the clause: "the times, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators." And every one knows that the contemporaneous exposition of that part of the Constitution, familiar also to every one in the country, the exposition by Madison and Hamilton was to the effect that "every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation," and according to Mr. Madison, quoting a Southern authority, it was "more consonant to just theories to intrust the Union with the care of its own existence than to transfer that care to any other hands."

There is not the slightest possible denial here that this is a constitutional exercise of power. If there is such a denial it is a mere individual opinion. There has been no adjudication in the least degree looking to the unconstitutionality of these laws. Your individual opinion is no better than mine; mine is no better than that of any other man who can hear a horn blown from the front steps of the Capitol. No individual opinion is worth anything. We have a department of the Government to pass upon the question. The legislative department has enacted these laws under what it believed to be a clear and explicit grant of power, and you have never had it judicially determined otherwise. But now you propose to assault the election laws, the supervisors, and the marshals in this military bill; and under the pretense of getting rid of troops at the polls you propose that no Federal officer—no civil officer of the Federal Government—shall be there. That is the design; that is the plain, palpable object. An amendment that will be offered here will test your sincerity on that subject; whether you will allow the Federal Government to be present at all. I believe you do propose to allow two men of straw to stand up without any power; to be present as witnesses; to be counted themselves but not to count, as my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] well suggests; with no power whatever; mere spectators on sufferance, not to be hustled out nor kicked nor clubbed if they behave themselves, but entirely at the mercy of the mob; guests standing there by the courtesy of the State, not standing there armed with the panoply of the Federal Government and commanding in its great name an observance of law and of justice. You propose simply to permit, and permit is the word, two officers to be designated by Federal authority to be present, that is all; not to have one particle of power, not to be clothed with a solitary attribute of authority, not to have any force, not to have any legal status beyond that of casual spectators; and, therefore, I say that you cannot debate this question without associating these two bills together. The one runs right into the other; and I go so far as to say that if the military bill should go through in its present form and become the law of the land, the remainder of this law on election day is not worth anything at all. The whole law of marshals and supervisors is worth nothing unless the civil authority of the United States has the power there to enforce its edicts.

We are told, too, rather a novel thing, that if we do not take these laws we are not to have the appropriations. I believe it has been announced in both branches of Congress, I suppose on the authority of the democratic caucus, that if we do not take these bills as they are planned we shall not have any of the appropriations that go with them. The honorable Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] told it to us on Friday; the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] told it to us last session; the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] told it to us at the same time; and I am not permitted to speak of the legions who told us so in the other House. They say all these appropriations are to be refused; not merely the Army appropriation, for they do not stop at that. Look for a moment at the legislative bill that came from the democratic caucus. Here is an appropriation in it for defraying the expenses of the Supreme Court and the circuit and district courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia, &c., "$2,800,000:" "Provided"—provided what?

"That the following sections of the Revised Statutes relating to elections," going on to recite them, "be repealed." That is, you will pass an appropriation for the support of the judiciary of the United States only on condition of this repeal. We often speak of this Government being divided between three co-ordinate departments, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial—co-ordinate, independent, equal. The legislative under the control of a democratic caucus now steps forward and says "we offer to the Executive this bill and if he does not sign it we are going to starve the judiciary." That is carrying the thing a little farther than I have ever known. We do not merely propose to starve the Executive if he will not sign the bill, but we propose to starve the judiciary that has had nothing whatever to do with the question. That has been boldly avowed on this floor; that has been boldly avowed in the other House; that has been boldly avowed in democratic papers throughout the country.

And you propose not merely to starve the judiciary but you propose that you will not appropriate a solitary dollar to take care of this

Capitol. The men who take care of this great amount of public property are provided for in that bill. You say they shall not have any pay if the President will not agree to change the election laws. There is the public printing that goes on for the enlightenment of the whole country and for printing the public documents of every one of the Departments. You say they shall not have a dollar for public printing unless the President agrees to repeal these laws.

There is the Congressional Library that has become the pride of the whole American people for its magnificent growth and extent. You say it shall not have one dollar to take care of it, much less add a new book, unless the President signs these bills. There is the Department of State that we think throughout the history of the Government has been a great pride to this country for the ability with which it has conducted our foreign affairs; it is also to be starved. You say we shall not have any intercourse with foreign nations, not a dollar shall be appropriated therefor unless the President signs these bills. There is the Light-House Board that provides for the beacons and the warnings on seventeen thousand miles of sea and gulf and lake coast. You say those lights shall all go out and not a dollar shall be appropriated for the board if the President does not sign these bills. There are the mints of the United States at Philadelphia, New Orleans, Denver, San Francisco, coining silver and coining gold—not a dollar shall be appropriated for them if the President does not sign these bills. There is the Patent Office, the patents issued which embody the invention of the country—not a dollar for them. The Pension Bureau shall cease its operations unless these bills are signed and patriotic soldiers may starve. The Agricultural Bureau, the Post-Office Department, every one of the great executive functions of the Government is threatened, taken by the throat, highwayman-style, collared on the highway, commanded to stand and deliver in the name of the democratic congressional caucus. That is what it is; simply that. No committee of this Congress in either branch has ever recommended that legislation—not one. Simply a democratic caucus has done it.

Of course this is new. We are learning something every day. I think you may search the records of the Federal Government in vain; it will take some one much more industrious in that search than I have ever been, and much more observant than I have ever been to find any possible parallel or any possible suggestion in our past history of any such thing. Most of the Senators who sit in this Chamber can remember some vetoes by Presidents that shook this country to its center with excitement. The veto of the national-bank bill by Jackson in 1832, remembered by the oldest in this Chamber; the veto of the national-bank bill in 1841 by Tyler, remembered by those not the oldest, shook this country with a political excitement which up to that time had scarcely a parallel; and it was believed, whether rightfully or wrongfully is no matter, it was believed by those who advocated those financial measures at the time that they were of the very last importance to the well-being and prosperity of the people of the Union. That was believed by the great and shining lights of that day. It was believed by that man of imperial character and imperious will, the great Senator from Kentucky. It was believed by Mr. Webster, the greatest of New England Senators. When Jackson vetoed the one or Tyler vetoed the other, did you ever hear a suggestion that those bank charters should be put on appropriation bills or that there should not be a dollar to run the Government until they were signed? So far from that, in 1841, when temper was at its height; when the whig party, in addition to losing their great measure, lost it under the sting and the irritation of what they believed was a desertion by the President whom they had chosen; and when Mr. Clay, goaded by all these considerations, rose to debate the question in the Senate, he repelled the suggestion of William C. Rives, of Virginia, who attempted to make upon him the point that he had indulged in some threat involving the independence of the Executive. Mr. Clay rose to his full height and thus responded:

> I said nothing whatever of any obligation on the part of the President to conform his judgment to the opinions of the Senate and the House of Representatives, although the Senator argued as if I had, and persevered in so arguing after repeated correction. I said no such thing. I know and I respect the perfect independence of each department, acting within its proper sphere, of the other departments.

A leading democrat, an eloquent man, a man who has courage and frankness and many good qualities, has boasted publicly that the democracy are in power for the first time in eighteen years, and they do not intend to stop until they have wiped out every vestige of every war measure. Well, "forewarned is forearmed," and you begin appropriately on a measure that has the signature of Abraham Lincoln. I think the picture is a striking one when you hear these words from a man who was then in arms against the Government of the United States, doing his best to destroy it, exerting every power given him in a bloody and terrible rebellion against the authority of the United States and when Abraham Lincoln was marching at the same time to his martyrdom in its defense! Strange times have fallen upon us that those of us who had the great honor to be associated in higher or lower degree with Mr. Lincoln in the administration of the Government should live to hear men in public life and on the floors of Congress, fresh from the battle-fields of the rebellion, threatening the people of the United States that the democratic party, in power for the first time in eighteen years, proposes not to stay its hand until every vestige of the war measures has been wiped out! The late vice-president of the confederacy boasted—perhaps I had better say stated—that for sixty out of the seventy-two years preceding the outbreak of the rebellion, from the foundation of the Government, the South, though in a minority, had by combining with what he termed the anti-centralists in the North ruled the country; and in 1866 the same gentleman indicated in a speech, I think before the Legislature of Georgia, that by a return to Congress the South might repeat the experiment with the same successful result. I read that speech at the time; but I little thought I should live to see so near a fulfillment of its prediction. I see here to-day two great measures emanating, as I have said, not from a committee of either House, but from a democratic caucus in which the South has an overwhelming majority, two-thirds in the House, and out of forty-two Senators on the other side of this Chamber professing the democratic faith thirty are from the South—twenty-three, a positive and pronounced majority, having themselves been participants in the war against the Union either in military or civil station. So that as a matter of fact, plainly deducible from counting your fingers, the legislation of this country to-day, shaped and fashioned in a democratic caucus where the confederates of the South hold the majority, is the realization of Mr. STEPHENS's prophecy. And very appropriately the House under that control and the Senate under that control, embodying thus the entire legislative powers of the Government, deriving its political strength from the South, elected from the South, say to the President of the United States, at the head of the Executive Department of the Government, elected as he was from the North—elected by the whole people, but elected as a northern man; elected on republican principles, elected in opposition to the party that controls both branches of Congress to-day—they naturally say, "You shall not exercise your constitutional power to veto a bill."

Some gentlemen may rise and say, "Do you call it revolution to put an amendment on an appropriation bill?" Of course not. There have been a great many amendments put on appropriation bills, some mischievous and some harmless; but I call it the audacity of revolution for any Senator or Representative or any caucus of Senators or Representatives to get together and say, "We will have this legislation or we will stop the great Departments of the Government." That is revolutionary. I do not think it will amount to revolution; my opinion is it will not. I think that is a revolution that will not go around; I think that is a revolution which will not revolve; I think that is a revolution whose wheel will not turn; but it is a revolution if persisted in, and if not persisted in it must be backed out from with ignominy. The democratic party in Congress have put themselves exactly in this position to-day, that if they go forward in the announced programme, they march to revolution. I think they will in the end go back in an ignominious retreat. That is my judgment.

The extent to which they control the legislation of the country is worth pointing out. In round numbers the southern people are about one-third of the population of the Union. I am not permitted to speak of the organization of the House of Representatives, but I can refer to that of the last House. In the last House of Representatives, of the forty-two standing committees the South had twenty-five. I am not blaming the honorable Speaker for it. He was hedged in by partisan forces and could not avoid it. In this very Senate, out of thirty-four standing committees the South has twenty-two. I am not calling these things up just now in reproach; I am only showing what an admirable prophet the late vice-president of the southern confederacy was, and how entirely true all his words have been and how he has lived to see them realized.

I do not profess to know, Mr. President, least of all Senators on this floor, certainly as little as any Senator on this floor, do I profess to know, what the President of the United States will do when these bills are presented to him, as I suppose in due course of time they will be. I certainly should never speak a solitary word of disrespect of the gentleman holding that exalted position, and I hope I should not speak a word unbefitting the dignity of the office of a Senator of the United States. But as there has been speculation here and there on both sides as to what he would do, it seems to me that the dead heroes of the Union would rise from their graves if he should consent to be intimidated and outraged in his proper constitutional power by threats like these.

All the war measures of Abraham Lincoln are to be wiped out say leading democrats! The Bourbons of France busied themselves, I believe, after the restoration in removing every trace of Napoleon's power and grandeur, even chiseling the "N" from public monuments raised to perpetuate his glory; but the dead man's hand from Saint Helena reached out and destroyed them in their pride and in their folly. And I tell the Senators on the other side of this Chamber,—I tell the democratic party North and South,—South in the lead and North following,—that the slow, unmoving finger of scorn from the tomb of the martyred President on the prairies of Illinois will wither and destroy them. "Though dead he speaketh." [Great applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Sergeant-at-Arms will preserve order in the galleries and arrest persons manifesting approbation or disapprobation.

Mr. BLAINE. When you present these bills with these threats to the living President, who bore the commission of Abraham Lincoln and served with honor in the Army of the Union which Lincoln restored and preserved, I can think only of one appropriate response from his lips or his pen. He should say to you with all the scorn befitting his station:

> Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, as the Senator to whom the charge of this bill has been intrusted by the committee, I propose to make one or two brief statements in response to the rhetorical and highly imaginative utterance to which we have just listened.

The object of the Committee on Appropriations, or a majority of that committee, in reporting this bill was simply to provide for the repeal of a law under the operation of which it is possible that the freedom of elections may be utterly destroyed. The fact which has been alluded to by the Senator from Maine so frequently and forcibly that few soldiers were to be found now in any of the States east of the Mississippi, and his futile attempt to divert public attention from the principle which lies at the bottom of this great question to a consideration of that immaterial issue, will not, I am sure, produce much effect upon this Senate or upon the country. It is not a question before this body to decide whether a sufficient number of soldiers are to be found distributed among the States of this Union to dominate and control elections; but the question is, whether under the conditions of the existing law it may not be possible for an Executive who shall so desire to so distribute and so use the soldiery as to destroy the freedom of elections. It is not to confront a present danger which threatens imminently to interfere with elections, but it is to remove from the present or any future Executive the temptation which the possession of this power would offer, should he desire so to do, to destroy the liberties of this people and erect upon the ruins of the Republic a despotism supported by the arms of a soldiery.

Is this a vain and chimerical fear? The Senator from Maine seems so to regard it; and yet if we look back at the history of every free people who have ever lost their liberties we shall find that without one solitary exception their liberties have been destroyed through the operation of the military, through the agency of its commander or under the direction of an ambitious prince or ruler. I do not choose now to discuss this question in the light of the various statements which have been made by republicans recognized as high authority in their party in other days when the use of the Army was the subject for debate, because the very liberal quotations made by the Senator from West Virginia the other day show that leading Senators of the republican side have committed themselves over and over against all possible use of military at the elections, and it does not lie in the mouth of the Senator from Maine or any of his colleagues to find fault with us for continuing the same line of argument.

Mr. President, I will state frankly and fully that it is not in the utterances of Senators and Representatives discussing the policy of a party that we are to find those opinions upon which we can most rely in the settlement of so vital a principle as this. I do not profess myself to be above that silent influence which is exerted by political policy in forming opinions upon questions which press upon us for immediate solution; and whether it be with regard to the use of troops to enforce the fugitive slave law or the various acts which were passed about the time Kansas was erected into a separate State, I am free to state that the parties held positions on those questions which are now precisely reversed.

But, sir, I wish to go back to a period antecedent to this; I wish to view the question in the light of the declarations of those Senators who were part and parcel of this Constitution, of those who were contemporaneous with its formation, and I aver on this floor without the fear of successful contradiction that in the debates, both in the convention which framed the Constitution and in the State conventions which approved and ratified it, this question of a standing army and its possible use in controlling and dominating elections was, without distinction of party, the point which elicited most interest and most debate, and whether in federal Massachusetts or in republican Virginia, those who stood highest in the councils of each of those States bore united testimony to the dangers to liberty which were involved in the presence of a standing army. It is not, therefore, out of place that I should solicit the attention of the Senate to the discussions which accompanied the adoption of the Constitution as furnishing opinions on which we can best rely as to the dangers that lurk in this feature of the question which we are now discussing.

I have before me authorities from the debates which were held on this subject in various States, New York, Massachusetts, and Virginia, notably the latter, where the contemporaneous opinion of those men who took an active part in the formation of this instrument, with one consent, declared that the liberties of no people could be regarded as safe in the presence of a military force wielded by the ruler of that country. I will not detain the Senate by reciting them in extenso. I simply remark that Hamilton himself, who was the head and front of the federalists of that day and who was accused of a strong leaning to monarchical government, admitted the dangers which lurked in the weakness of our Constitution in that regard. But it was George Mason, of Virginia, who more than any one else was instrumental in framing and shaping this instrument, who gave utterance to that sentiment which has lived from that time to the present and is now accepted as an axiom among all lovers of civil liberty, that "the liberty of the people has been destroyed only by those who are military commanders."

It is but a puerile effort (if Senators will pardon me for using the term) when a Senator on this floor rises in his place and, instead of attacking the principles which underlie this great question, devotes himself for half an hour to the attempt to ridicule the arguments of those who oppose him by stating the fact that only one soldier to a county is to be found throughout the States east of the Mississippi. It is an admission on the part of that Senator of the poverty of his case when he can find no stronger argument to use in opposition to the bill which is now before this body. It is not that Senators here fear the presence of one or two or fifty men who may be in their respective States, but it is that a provision of law now exists which renders it possible that not only those who are there, but others, may be brought there if the exigency requires it and the condition of the public mind or the exigencies of party necessity demand that they should be so used to dominate and control elections. In other words, the presence of the military at the polls is absolutely incompatible with free government; and I announce that as the principle upon which this bill, with this clause of which we hear so much, has been based.

And, sir, before proceeding further with the subject, I will read an expression of another Virginian who in discussing this very feature of the Constitution used language much more forcible than any I can command, and whose words will be a meet reply to the wild declamation of the Senator from Maine:

> It is on a supposition that your American governors shall be honest that all the good qualities of this government are founded; but its defective and imperfect construction puts it in their power to perpetrate the worst of mischiefs, should they be bad men; and, sir, would not all the world, from the eastern to the western hemisphere, blame our distracted folly in resting our rights upon the contingency of our rulers being good or bad? Show me that age and country where the rights and liberties of the people were placed on the sole chance of their rulers being good men, without a consequent loss of liberty! I say that the loss of that dearest privilege has ever followed, with absolute certainty, every such mad attempt—3 Elliot's Debates, page 59.

If the existence of this clause on the statute-book does not place our liberties at the mercy of our governors in this respect, it is impossible for me to understand what other construction can be put upon it. Give the liberty of using the soldiery at the polls under the pretext of preserving the peace, and I assert that there is not a single election which can be held throughout the length and breadth of the United States that may not be dominated and controlled by the President with the bayonet, and I challenge a denial of the position. The privilege is to use troops to preserve peace at the polls! Why, sir, our recent experience has demonstrated how small may be the loop upon which this provision can be made to hang. The mere threat, or rumor of a threat, that the peace may not be preserved at the polls suffices to precipitate upon any community, where party necessity may demand it, the military in such numbers as to exercise terrorism over the people and prevent that freedom of election which is alone compatible with the existence of civil liberty.

I am not oblivious to the fact that at the time this legislation was first enacted the disturbed condition of the country, just then emerging from a civil war the magnitude of which the world has never seen equaled, might excuse, if indeed it did not justify, a stretch of authority not warranted under the general provisions of the Constitution; but however necessary it may have been at that time, the necessity manifestly no longer exists, and now is the time for the repeal of those measures under the practical operation of which it is possible that such woeful evils may result.

Mr. President, I had taken notes of some of the positions assumed by the Senator from Maine, but I do not propose to be led off by him in his discursive consideration of this question from the material facts which have controlled the committee in their recommendations to this body. They are briefly such as I have enumerated, and upon these reasons we are willing to go before the country.

I do not propose to lug into this discussion the provisions of a bill which is not pending before this body, nor to drag from the table newspaper correspondence, statements, or assertions made at random and wildly, on which to hang an argument. The proposition before this body is simply and plainly to strike out those provisions of law which authorize the presence of the military at the polls for the purpose of preserving the peace. We will confine ourselves to the discussion of this question. We put it upon the ground that it is not necessary for the preservation of the peace under any circumstance likely to occur or possible to occur, that it is not a duty which it was designed by the Constitution should be fulfilled by the Army, that it is the true province of the States to exercise police jurisdiction and to preserve the peace within their borders, and that a departure from this principle which would place the Government of the United States in supreme control over these matters would be absolutely destructive of the liberties of the States and of the liberties of the people as well.

But the Senator asserts that the issues which we have made before the people by the presentation of these bills are false, slanderous, and scandalous. Without pausing to criticise the peculiar expression which the Senator has thought proper to use in this connection, I simply join issue with him and assert that it is no false issue when we propose to repeal a law which permits the soldiery to be used in elections, guarded only by the discretion of the commanding officer or the President of the United States; that it is no false issue to say that our elections shall be held without the presence of bayonets, that our ballots shall be cast without the danger of bullets, and that neither the General Government nor any other power shall step in between the suffragan and the ballot-box and decide how or when he shall vote. These things are by the Constitution left to the control of the States, and there we propose to leave them by repealing this new legislation which had its origin after the war and which is no longer necessary upon any pretext whatsoever.

The points made by the Senator from Maine, which were mainly his references to a bill that is not yet before this body, not yet having passed the other House of Congress, I shall leave to be considered when the bill comes before us, if indeed it shall come, satisfied that there will be found sufficient argument and sufficient reason to meet and confute every proposition so vauntingly put forth by the Senator from Maine.

No person, so far as I am aware, upon this floor, certainly none within my hearing, has ever laid down a proposition that the President of the United States shall not be permitted to exercise his constitutional power to veto a bill. The Senator from Maine asserts that this declaration is the very audacity of revolution; but, sir, I have yet to hear such a declaration made. We propose simply to pass an appropriation bill; we propose to vote the money which has been voted by the other House for the support of the Army. There are conditions connected with it which we think are clearly within the province of the House to pass and of the Senate to approve; and there our agency in the matter ends. We do not venture to predict, nor is it our purpose to shape our course in any degree by what may or may not be the views of the President upon this subject. I shall not attempt to take away one particle of that spinal marrow which was attempted to be given to the President in the vicarious action of the Senator from Maine. I shall not attempt to influence him by pointing out how ridiculous are the agencies which are relied upon to get that spinal cord into the backbone which may need some stiffening; but if nothing but "the gorgons and chimeras dire" which the heated fancy of the Senator from Maine has called up from the tomb, if no better reasons than these can be found to exist, I submit that they will scarcely prove effective in so material an issue as giving or withholding signature to the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, this bill comes from the Committee on Appropriations of this body. It does not come, as has been asserted in this Chamber, from a secret conclave or caucus. It comes from the authorized organization of this Chamber, the Senate Committee on Appropriations; and I rise now to speak simply because I am one of its members charged with that duty. As one of that committee, I rise to speak to the purposes, the causes, the reasons that prompted that committee to agree to the insertion of the clause which is contested by the Senator from Maine. This bill came through the Senate door by the usual channel of communication with the House of Representatives, in the hands of its Clerk, to this body. It went to the President's desk, and thence to the Committee on Appropriations, and it came back to this Chamber from that committee in the usual manner. Nay, more, sir, it is the bill almost in word and letter that was adopted by the committees of conference at the last session of Congress, agreed upon by the committees of conference of the two Houses, and which but for the disagreement between those committees upon this single section would have been passed by that Congress. This bill, so far from having been treated as measures that come from a committee of conference usually are, has been debated and contested again and again in committee, in the House, and in the Senate Chamber. The declaration that it is the edict of caucus is mere idle wind; such a statement has nothing whatever to base it. This is the bill upon which the two Houses disagreed in the last Congress; it is the bill that came from the House, that went to the committee, that came back to this Chamber through the regular committees of this body, and it is now put upon its passage with the forms and in the customary mode adopted in such cases.

This bill contains but a single disputed section. To that the Senator from Maine addressed himself; to that we address ourselves. There is but a single issue presented by this bill, to that I shall try to confine myself. All that hear me and the country know that the convulsive throes of a great people in a tremendous civil war have caused many departures from those vital principles that lie at the base of all civil liberty. The history of our race and the precedents of the past point them out as essential elements in the preservation of our own freedom, and its most earnest struggles ever have been and ever will be made for their safety. The necessities of the hour may cause a free people to bear for a time the subjection of the civil to the military power, the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus or the presence of armed troops at election polls, but these must pass away with the necessity that gave them birth. They can never be crystallized upon the necks of Anglo-Saxons.

The single issue involved in this bill is, shall the executive arm of the Government longer possess the power to place troops at the election polls? Their presence there or the power to place them there is equally a menace to the people and a departure from the right of free elections. That is the issue, the sole, the only issue that is in this bill. We make no other; we will be diverted not from this.

The mere presence of armed troops at the polls is a menace to individual liberty. The shadow of the power of armed men is in itself a threat, and no free people will bear it. It was one of the struggles between Charles I and his first three Parliaments that he should yield to them the right he claimed to quarter troops upon the people. Parliament refused to give him money and he was accustomed to send troops into the country districts and compel them to be quartered and supported by the people without authority of law. The Commons placed it in their bills; they formulated and crystallized it in the petition of right, and they made the king yield to their just demands in behalf of the people. This right and privilege is registered in the bill of rights of nearly every constitution in all this land. The power to quarter troops upon the people was wrung from the kingly power of Great Britain by placing it upon bills under which he was voted supplies to carry on a war for the Palatinate with Spain. Before they would yield him those supplies they compelled him to agree to a concession of this great right, and the right to be free from such intrusion became fixed and certain. The correlative right in regard to free election and the absence of troops from the polls is found still farther back in English history. The menace of armed troops at the polls was prohibited by a statute in the reign of George II, and it recites the existence of the right to be free from this menace as old as the time of Edward I. In the thirteenth century, nearly six hundred years ago, the race from whom we obtain our liberty and law, from whose loins we mainly sprang, asserted the doctrine that this right of free election belonged to the people and ought not to be jeopardized. It was a right wrung, absolutely wrung, from the hand of power in the time of Edward I. It was resurrected in the time of George II, and then enacted into law in 1735. Let us see what was done. I shall not read the statute. A law was passed in 1735 which forbade the presence of armed troops within two miles of the election polls. Subsequently, in 1741, the executive power (forgetting the existence of this statute)—

> During the corrupt administration of Sir Robert Walpole, at an election held for the city of Westminster, under an order signed by three magistrates of the county, a body of armed soldiers was marched up and stationed in the church-yard of Saint Paul, Covent Garden, in the vicinity of the poll; and on this being shown to the House of Commons, they passed a resolution affirming "that the presence of a regular body of armed soldiers at an election of members to serve in Parliament is a high infringement of the liberties of the subject, a manifest violation of the freedom of elections, and an open defiance of the laws and constitution of this kingdom." The high bailiff was taken into custody by order of the House, and the three magistrates who signed the order were brought to the bar and reprimanded by the Speaker, upon their knees, as the House had directed; and after this the House passed a vote of thanks to the Speaker for his reprimand of the delinquents, and directed the same to be printed.—Brightly's Leading Cases on Elections, 603, 604.

Sir, this right, thus vindicated, is a part of our system. These privileges are a part of our own free liberties. They come to us with the system of laws under which we live. They belong to us as an integral part of our system of free elections, and we would be false to our highest duty if we should fail to protect them and assert their existence. I now quote from McCrary on Elections, section 418. He says:

> There can, however, be no doubt but that the law looks with great disfavor upon anything like an interference by the military with the freedom of an election. An armed force in the neighborhood of the polls is almost of necessity a menace to the voters, and an interference with their freedom and independence, and if such armed force be in the hands of or under the control of the partisan friends of any particular candidate or set of candidates, the probability of improper influence becomes still stronger.

This proposition does not stand alone on the thought of taking out of this section the authority for the presence of armed troops at the polls under Federal law, but it goes beyond this and finds its reason and its root in the right of the States to control this subject entirely. The control of free elections, the guarantee for their existence, does not belong to the Federal Government; it belongs to the States themselves and always has belonged there. The constitution of almost every State in this country contains in its bill of rights a guarantee of free elections. The States controlled the franchise. With them, both before and since the formation of the Constitution, was vested the power and the right to guard the purity and the freedom of elections.

Let the Senators from New England, and the Senators from the great West, and the Senators from the Middle States and the South take up the bills of rights of their respective States and see what is guaranteed. In nearly all of them the guarantee is that all elections shall be free. Here is the crystallization of the doctrine that comes to us from the time of Edward I, which found voice in the time of Charles I and George II, and is now one of the privileges and rights of this people. In Pennsylvania, as long since as 1803, its rulers enacted this statute:

> No body of troops, being regularly employed in the Army of the United States or of this State, shall appear and be present, either armed or unarmed, at any place of election within this State, during the time of said election.

This wholesome provision was re-enacted in 1839, and it is now a part of the law of that Commonwealth. The enactment of this law followed the time of the alien and sedition law. The necessity had come for the people to enact it. Jefferson was in power here, his party was in control in that great State, and public sentiment found vent in the statute that protected at the polls the citizen from armed interference or control in any way by Federal or other troops. New York crystallized this right in her statutes as early as 1818, and prohibited the military from appearing or exercising on election day, or during ten days preceding it; and the same is the law in Wisconsin. Massachusetts, Maine, New Jersey, and Rhode Island forbid their militia from parading on election day, and imposed penalties for its violation. Virginia, by her constitution, exempted the voter from military service on election day, and denied the franchise to every non-commissioned officer and private in the United States Army or seaman or marine in the United States Navy, while Maryland prescribed that no officer should muster or march any troops within view of the polls on election day.

I take the constitution of Pennsylvania of 1873 and I read from the bill of rights:

Elections shall be free and equal; and no power, civil or military, shall at any time interfere to prevent the free exercise of the rights of suffrage.

This is embodied, too, in the constitutions of Colorado and Missouri, enacted since, almost in word and letter.

But, sir, the Federal Constitution has not a syllable on this subject. Neither in its main provisions nor in the original amendments which secured the liberties of the people is there one word upon the subject of free elections. The Federal Government had no control over the subject; and they did not attempt to assert any right in reference to it. The control of elections and the guarantee for them belonged to the States; there it was vested and there it is to remain. Prior to 1864 the only attempt at its control here was when John Marshall, in the House of Representatives, in the year 1800, under the elder Adams, reported a statute giving to the Federal Government control of elections so far as to prevent armed interference at the polls; but when the measure came to the Senate it was defeated. It failed because the Federal Government had no control over it. There was no dream, no thought, of exercising this right by the Federal Government until it was done under the war power in the border States in 1862-'63-'64. Troops were then placed at the polls for the alleged protection of what was claimed to be the rights of so-called loyal men there. The first exercise of this right by the Federal Government was under the war power. It did not come from any grant from the people or the States, but solely and exclusively from what was claimed as a war power, and like many others of the same character, force was its essential element. To escape from this and to restore to the people that which they had never parted from with their own consent, the act of 1865 was introduced at the close of the war by Senator Powell, of Kentucky. In its original form it gave security from intrusion and re-enacted what was the undoubted law of every State. It was not permitted to pass until it was amended by republican Senators by the insertion of the words that are now proposed to be taken out and the guarantee of free elections claimed from the Federal Government thus became a means for intruding its mailed hand at the polls. Nothing but the abnormal condition of the country in 1865 and since could have produced the excrescence that we now propose to remove.

The bill as originally introduced (I have it before me) had no words authorizing troops to be present either to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls. As introduced the bill was a guarantee of the right that existed in the States, and a restriction upon the power of the Federal Government, which was then being used wrongfully and oppressively upon the people of the border States. The bill was sent to the Committee on the Judiciary of this body, a republican committee. It slumbered there for a number of months, and then came back with a report by Mr. Howard with a negative recommendation. He holds that the right to exercise the war power in 1864 to prevent men who were not loyal from voting was a just and proper exercise of power. Senator Powell, desiring to relieve his people from wrongful oppression, pressed the bill again and again, until in June, 1864, it was put upon its passage, and then he agreed to the amendment that troops might be used to repel the armed enemies of the United States. This was adopted without dissent.

Then Mr. Pomeroy, of Kansas, a republican Senator moved to add the words "or to keep the peace at the polls." Upon that amendment the yeas and nays were called. Every "yea" vote was given by a republican and every democrat voted "nay." Reverdy Johnson, John P. Hale, and Senator Hicks, of Maryland, voted with the democrats. This provision which is now proposed to be eliminated, "or to keep the peace at the polls," was adopted by a vote of 16 republicans against 15 democrats and others. Then the question came upon the passage of the bill as thus amended, and the Senator from Kentucky, desiring to protect his people, was willing to take anything to save them from the pressure that was upon them, and accepted the bill in that form; but even then they were scarcely willing to pass it. Nowhere else in all the history of this Government had this claim of power appeared. Here, and here alone, is the only instance of the iron-clad arm of the Federal power appearing at the ballot-box.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him just at that point?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator present the idea that the amendment put on that bill by the republican Senators was to control voting at the elections in Kentucky by democrats who had a right to vote; or will the Senator accept the suggestion that it was to keep the rebel army that had gone from Kentucky to fight in the confederate ranks from coming back and controlling the elections? In other words, they were confederate soldiers when the fighting was going on, and they voted in a Union State when elections were held. That was the whole of the provision.

Mr. HOAR. They were democratic voters.

Mr. BLAINE. They were democratic voters who were fighting against the Union under Jeff. Davis and who came back to control the elections of the State of Kentucky.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator from Maine has interjected a speech into the body of what I was saying. He has not asked a question, but in his usual manner he has injected his thought into the midst of my argument. He may have that opinion or not, just as he pleases. My assertion was, and it is, that the use of this power by the Federal Government was simply the exercise of the war power, and that Senators, including himself, who undertake to sustain it follow legitimately to its conclusion the argument that the war power fifteen years after the end of the war ought still to control the rights and liberties of this people. That is my answer to the Senator's injected speech. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MCMILLAN in the chair.) Will the Senator from Pennsylvania suspend a moment? The galleries must not applaud under any circumstances. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that the rules of the Senate are enforced.

Mr. WALLACE. We are done with the abnormal condition that came from the war. This people ask to be restored to their normal rights, whether it be in the South or in the North. Just here I will tell the Senator from Maine that at the election in 1869 for governor of Pennsylvania, in the third precinct of the fifth ward of the city of Philadelphia, an armed body of marines were brought to the polls; that they took possession thereof and closed and kept them closed for an hour until they saw fit to open them and permit those to vote whom they thought ought to vote. Sir, the mail-clad arm of the Federal Government has shown itself in Broad street, Philadelphia, within three years. The people of our State want no more of this. I speak for my own people. They want free elections, without either the shadow or the substance of military power, either State or Federal. They want the very essence of the provisions of our own Constitution recognized in practice as it is in truth as the law of the land. I am here representing so far as I can that people in asking at the hands of the Senate of the United States that this menace, this threat, this assumption of right that does not belong to the Federal Government may be eliminated from her statutes and that the States and the people of the States may control this question as they ought and of right are entitled to do. In Mexico, even in poor down-trodden Mexico, when our troops were at the city of Mexico in the war of 1846-'47, because there was a provision in their laws that troops should not be present at the election polls the Federal Army was withdrawn therefrom in order that there might seem to be no menace or control, and Peña y Peña was elected in the room of Santa Anna. The Federal troops obeyed the law of Mexico because it was a part of the Mexican guarantee of civil liberty, and because our Army, its officers and soldiers, in those days recognized the doctrine which we contend for now, that the menace of armed men at the polls is utterly incompatible with free elections.

We propose to take out the words "or to keep the peace at the polls," and the statute will then stand as is the law of Pennsylvania to-day. Of the necessity for this action, arising from practical experience, I shall not now speak. I content myself with the assertion of the broad principle that free elections with troops at the polls are impossible. The right and the power in the executive arm of either State or Federal government to place troops at the polls on election day is an utter denial of what is vital to the free exercise of the elective franchise. I care not whether there be but one soldier to ten thousand square miles or one soldier to every acre in this broad country. Behind the power of one soldier acting under the authority of the executive command of military power at the polls stand forty million people. It is the obedience of this people to law, it is the recognition that law is mighty and that the man with his blue coat and his bayonet is a representative of forty million people that gives potency and majesty to his presence. When you place him there as that representative the effect is as it was in the precinct I have named in our own State in 1869. Then all men bowed their heads in forced obedience, for the Federal power was there to intimidate and control them; they dare not attack it; they must acquiesce; the law unlawfully asserted coerced obedience.

This sentiment of obedience to law actuates all of our people, and it is because law and the power of law brings troops to the polls without necessity and in derogation of one of our great rights that we seek to repeal this statute. In my own experience I have had to send an unarmed sheriff to arrest a crowd of men acting in violation of law. When it was suggested that we should have troops to aid the officer, I said no, a true and brave man acting in the performance of his duty under the command of law is worth a thousand troops; and it so proved. The feeble assertion that there is no danger of intimidation because there is only one soldier to the thousand square miles is simply begging the question. Behind that one soldier stands the power of a great people. At the polls he is under the control of his officer and he may be directed to do what partisan aims or malignity may find for him to do. Such a possible use of power is the deprivation of that great right that finds its existence in every bill of rights in this country, that belongs to the people, is a part of their ancient liberties, and to be protected and preserved even at the sacrifice of the blood of Anglo-Saxons.

There has been in the past nothing of the kind, and its enforcement now takes away one of the greatest and dearest rights that belongs to this people.

We propose to take away this power. We propose to stand by the American system of free elections. That is our doctrine in this bill. We propose to stand by the American system as it exists in the bills of rights of the States and as it was found all over this country until this exercise of war power in 1862, 1863, and 1864. We propose to separate the ballot from the bayonet. We propose to restore to the civil power its absolute control over all the machinery of government. A free system of laws cannot tolerate even the possible use of force at the fountain-head of power. It is a standing menace, a perpetual threat. In the interest of the people, in the light of the plainest principles of civil liberty, in the performance of a plain duty, in the exercise of the legislative power of this people, we propose to restore to the American people their own system of free elections.

The Congress of the United States makes appropriations for but two years. The President of the United States cannot enlist a man or pay a dollar without an appropriation by Congress. Congress makes rules for the government of the land and naval forces, and these short appropriations and this limited authority of the Executive over them are the very basis of our system. We propose, as I have said, in the execution of a plain purpose, following precedents and practice and law and organic law to their legitimate results, to restore by this bill to the American people their own system of free elections. Why should we not do this? Who denies the right to free elections? Has the Senator from Maine denied this right? Will any Senator deny this right? Will any gentleman attempt to argue that the right to free elections does not belong to this people as one of their great cardinal rights? If so, why not restore it? The answer is much narrower than the concealed but real argument. Are the people not entitled to free elections? Why is it that Senators do not rise in their places and assert that the people have not a right to be free from Executive interference? The argument of the Senator from Maine is that you will not be interfered with, no troops will interfere with you; there are only so many troops here and so many there; you are not being interfered with. But the Senator forgets that upon the statute-books of this country there stands a law which gives to the Executive the power, the right to do this thing, and that in partisan bitterness, in the control of elections by one party or the other, a standing menace may become an actual, a terrible fact in the future as it has been in the past.

Are we met with a frank denial of the value of this right or of the right of this people to be freed at the polls from the menace of armed force? I venture to say that no Senator will put his argument upon that ground. None so bold as to assert that in the heated partisan contests that occur in the elections of this country the presence of armed troops, controlled by the one or the other political party, conduces to free elections. Either the substance or the shadow of military power at the polls is destructive of the essential element contemplated by almost every State constitution in this country in its express guarantee of free elections.

Another argument is used. Let us see what it is. First, we are denied the power to mold legislation. That is the first argument. The two Houses of Congress, the legislative power, is denied the right to mold legislation in its own way. Second, it is said to be a revolutionary practice and coercive of the Executive; and third, that our intent is (that is the drift of the argument made by the Senator from Maine) to break down the Government. My colleague in the House, the oldest in service there, who trains with the other side, who does not belong to the democratic party, treated this talk about revolution and coercion very well when he said it was "revolutionary in a Pickwickian sense." There is no revolution nor coercion here. This is an attempt to play upon words and upon passion in order to get a response from the people in antagonism to the assertion of the people's plain right.

The form of this legislation is sustained by precedents without number. The processes that we pursue are the modes of the Constitution. We neither seek to coerce the Executive nor submit to be coerced by him. We follow the line of precedent and the modes pointed out by the Constitution in every particular; there is no departure. The labored argument of the Senator from Maine that this is the dictate of a democratic caucus is an entire error. No democratic caucus ever saw this bill, no agency but that of the Senate and the House and the committees of the Senate and the House ever saw this bill and passed upon it. It is here as a result of the right of the representatives of this people to mold legislation through the recognized constitutional bodies.

Mr. BLAINE. I said, if the Senator will permit me, that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] stated on the floor that a committee of the democratic caucus was preparing these measures. That is what I said. If there is an issue of fact it is between the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Kentucky, not between the Senator from Pennsylvania and myself. I have it here:

Mr. BECK. As he is chairman of a committee—

That is, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,]— that is considering all these questions, and as we believe the democratic party will act wisely, &c.

Then follows:

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to understand him? To what committee does he refer as one of which the Senator from Ohio is chairman?

Mr. BECK. A democratic committee now considering how it is best for this side of the House, who have the responsibility, to act to determine how we can best present the measures fairly and properly.

And then, before any House committee was appointed, before there was any instrumentality of a parliamentary character through which they could be launched, these measures came out full fledged from a democratic caucus.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, I repeat my statement. The Senator from Maine and the Senator from Kentucky will settle that issue between themselves. I repeat that these bills came through constitutional processes in the mode and through the channels that the Constitution and the precedents point out, and that no democratic caucus or committee of a democratic caucus ever considered this bill or ever agreed that it should be reported.

It is said that we are trying to coerce the Executive. There is no attempt here at coercion. Where do you find it in this bill? It exists only in the lively imagination of the gentlemen who assert it. Sir, we will not coerce, nor will we submit to coercion, notwithstanding the finely-rounded periods with which the Senator from Maine concluded his remarks a few minutes ago in the effort to produce coercion.

We have our rights under the Constitution, and we propose to follow them to their legitimate conclusions. The Executive has his rights, and our performance of our duty will not be by one jot or tittle in the way of his performance of his duty as he thinks right to perform it under his oath and the Constitution. In the exercise of a plain duty imposed upon the legislative power, which is vested with the power to raise armies, to make rules for their government, and to enact all laws necessary to carry into execution the powers granted to it, these bodies are about to pass this bill in accordance with law and precedent. There is no provision of the bill violating the Constitution, and no pretense will be made that any does. Its disputed clause relates to the employment of the troops whose pay we vote. We have no issue with any other branch of the Government. We seek to make none. In the exercise of the rule of the majority we follow practice, precedent, law, and organic law to their legitimate result, as we judge our duty calls us. We will not be driven into any issue with any other power. Each of these bodies must perform for itself, under the oath that it has taken to support the Constitution, its clear and plain duty. When the Senator taunts us with the exercise of the negative of the Executive he undertakes to coerce the representatives of the people and of the States, the bodies vested by the Constitution with the legislative power.

The right to place legislation upon money bills belongs to the legislative power. It is nowhere denied in the Constitution. The propriety of the exercise of this right is to be judged of by the two Houses, and by them alone. No other branch of the Government can object to the bill for this reason. We are the sole and exclusive judges of this question, and when we act our judgment cannot be impugned by either the executive or the judiciary. The subject-matter of the legislation may be criticised, but the form of its enactment is solely within our own discretion.

The bill of last year conceded all that is asked by this bill. In conceding the posse comitatus clause everything that is in this bill was conceded, and yet we have this "tempest in a teapot" about nothing, so far as the power goes, at least. It is the removal of a menace, a threat upon the people, and the objection to its form was utterly and absolutely conceded away in the legislation of last year.

I affirm then, first, that the right to place legislation on money bills for the protection of the civil liberties of the people belongs to the legislative power and cannot be denied to it by any other branch of the Government; second, that the exercise of this right is sanctioned by practice; third, that it is sustained by precedents as old as the time of Charles I; and, fourth, that this legislation is constitutional and necessary and violates no provision of the Federal Constitution. Let us see. This power has been very frequently exercised by Congress, and the precedents are numerous and well known.

In order to ascertain what proportion of legislation concerning the Army of a general and permanent nature had been enacted previous to 1874 upon appropriation bills I made an examination of the Revised Statutes of the United States, passed at the first session of the Forty-third Congress—1873-'74—which "embrace the Statutes of the United States, general and permanent in their nature, in force on the 1st day of December, 1873, as revised and consolidated by commissioners appointed under an act of Congress." These laws are found under title 14, "The Army," and include sections 1094 to 1361, both inclusive, of the Revised Statutes. The number of sections under the title of "Army" is two hundred and sixty-eight. Of these ninety-two were derived directly from appropriation acts, including acts appropriating for the support of the Army, sundry civil, consular and diplomatic, Military Academy, and fortifications. Thus it appears that more than one-third of the general and permanent provisions of law regarding the Army were enacted upon appropriation bills prior to 1874. But, in fact, the proportion was much more than one-half, because many other sections were derived from acts consolidating the statutes in relation to the Army, passed from time to time, beginning at an early day in our legislation, which statutes were derived in great part from provisions attached to previous appropriation bills. These permanent and general provisions of law derived from appropriation bills were passed upon such in the years 1832, 1840, 1843, 1846, 1851, 1852, 1853, 1856, 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, 1861, 1862, 1863, 1865, 1866, 1867, 1868, 1869, 1870, 1872, and 1873, and the greater part of such legislation on appropriation bills concerning the Army was enacted during the rule of the republican party.

Second. I assert that this doctrine is sustained by precedents as old as the time of Charles I. The difficulties, as I have already said, between the first three Parliaments of his reign and the King grew out of efforts on his part to obtain supplies for the war for recovering the palatinate from Spain without concessions of any part of what he regarded as his prerogatives, and on the part of the Commons to make the supplies the conditions of concessions in favor of civil liberty. Now I take from English history the following:

The Commons House of Parliament in the year 1511 (third year of Henry VIII of sanguinary memory) tacked several acts of attainder as "amendments" to simple bills. These, of course, were leveled at certain Lords. The Commons never knew any limitation in that regard except such as they deliberately passed upon in their own right, and these assertions of the petition of right were a mere enforcement of their ancient privileges.

Charles I levied ship-money because Parliament included in "money bills" the guarantee of political rights. Everybody knows that the resistance of the King was not against the association of the items. The puerility of a separation of the items was not thought of—even by a Stuart! It was great cardinal principles upon which the Commons stood, and it was these the King resisted. He was compelled to yield, and his subsequent fatuity lost him his head.

William III, soon after his accession, made large grants to his favorites. These were under the law, and made with the consent of the council. In Parliament they were deemed exorbitant and prejudicial to the public good. Hence the House of Lords made the matter a subject of mild official rebuke by resolution in the year 1700, but the Commons went further and tacked to a "money bill" (for the support of the army and navy) an amendment called the "resumption act," which annulled all the grants, knowing at the time that some of them had been sold by the grantees. The Lords resisted long; the King at first resolved to stand by them, but he finally yielded, and the "money bill" passed with the unpalatable amendment. Yet the Commons of that day were particularly scrupulous in regard to "amendments" and precedents. In the year 1702 the Commons passed an act of attainder against the Pretender (just then recognized by Louis XIV) when war was imminent, arising out of the Spanish succession. The Lords put on an "amendment" including the name of the Pretender's mother, (Mary of Este, widow of James II, who had recently died after declaring Mary as regent,) but the Commons would not allow it, declaring that any amendment was improper on a bill of such importance. They were reminded of precedents in the time of Henry VIII, but the Commons would not yield.

As the right of the Commons to put amendments on "money bills" was unquestionable, the Lords would also exercise their right: so a short time before the death of the King the Lords—

Resolved, Never to pass a money bill with a clause tacked that was foreign to the body of the bill.

This is the case to which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] referred in his argument of the 20th of March, in reference to legislation on appropriation bills. But see the result. Only a few months earlier foreigners had been disqualified by act of Parliament from holding high office. William III died; Anne succeeded, and in the same year, 1702, the Tory Commons voted her an annual allowance of £100,000, that is, tacking to the bill an "amendment" providing for the retention of Prince George of Denmark, (the Queen's husband,) in his office of lord admiral and generalissmo of the forces, the actual commander being Marlborough. The Lords—they were Tories too—made a stand, but in the end gave way, notwithstanding their solemn "resolve" which was hardly six months old, and that seems to have been the last attempt to limit the Commons in shaping bills.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania state what he means by the Commons of England making an amendment to a money bill?

Mr. WALLACE. They placed upon that bill a provision that was foreign to the body of the bill and which had nothing whatever to do with it. It was an amendment relating to succession on a money bill for the support of the Army and the Navy. The Lords resisted it for a time, but finally gave way. This is in fact the law of the realm to-day. The Commons are absolutely masters of every subject of this kind. In their character as the representatives of the people they have enforced this and other great rights at the expense even of the blood of kings and the forfeiture of their thrones. The safety of the civil liberties of the people is above all price. No lesser motive should cause or ever has caused them to use this great power, nor should nor does any lesser one prompt us to use it now.

But it is asserted that this is revolutionary and coercive. The first answer to this argument upon this subject is that we have no right to assume in regard to this bill that any feature of this bill will meet disapproval anywhere. Why should such an assertion be made? Coercion is not asserted in the bill itself; it is not asserted by the committee; and why should the legislative branch of the Government, the immediate representatives of the people and of the States, be charged with coercion and told that their measures are revolutionary?

The practice of twenty years upon appropriation bills and the precedents that I have cited demonstrate that this is not a revolutionary measure, but that the processes are constitutional methods and in accordance with precedent. It is said we deny supplies to coerce agreement with us. There is no such threat in this bill. We grant supplies, but we connect the grant with a provision that the troops who are to be supplied shall obey the law that we enact. According to this argument our sole power is to vote supplies and to tax the people for those supplies, but we are denied the power to say how the Army shall be used. We are denied any control as to what shall be done with the money we vote, or if we seek to do so we are accused of being coercive and revolutionary. The argument is that we deny supplies and threaten coercion.

Sir, let us look at this subject. Congress has three branches. Each one is independent in its sphere. Each branch of Congress has a negative on the other, and that fact is a vital fact in the preservation of the liberties of this people. The English system of separate branches is our system, and it is vital in it that the Senate shall have an absolute negative upon the proceedings of the House, and the House shall have an absolute negative upon the proceedings of the Senate. But because the Senate refuses to pass a bill that has matter in it that the Senate will not agree to when it comes from the House, and refuses to pass a bill because of that matter, is the Senate revolutionary? Does that follow? It is the plainest proposition in the world that this is a constitutional right and invaluable as a check. It cannot be dispensed with as a part of the governmental theory of this country that each House is to have an absolute negative upon the other. And the negative of the Executive is a check upon the legislative branch, limited by the two-thirds provision.

The exercise by either House of its right to refuse to pass a bill because of denied matter in the bill is the exercise of a plain, clear, constitutional right. The exercise of this right by the Senate is by no means revolution. A President has the right to veto a bill. It is by no means revolutionary that he should veto a bill; yet he undertakes by the exercise of his qualified negative to require us to do what he wishes. That is a part of his clear right; it belongs to him under constitutional authority, and I would be the last to attempt to take it away from him. It is vital here as it is in the legislative branch. But when the Executive vetoes a bill and we pass the bill by two-thirds, we are practically coercing the Executive. That is the inevitable conclusion, but this is constitutional coercion. The Executive, in pursuance of his qualified negative given to him by the Constitution, returns us the bill with his objections, and two-thirds of the legislative branches pass the bill over his veto. We are coercing the executive power, but are we revolutionary? We are exercising the legislative power of this Republic, and it is neither revolutionary nor coercive.

But suppose the bill comes here and we have not the necessary two-thirds to pass it over his veto, what follows? We undertake to pass the bill, we put it upon reconsideration in accordance with the Constitution and it fails for want of two-thirds, what then? Are we to be coerced in regard to our legislative right? Are we to say that we must pass the bill in the form he wishes because the Executive has vetoed it? The right of non-action, the right to decline to act under such circumstances, is as much the right of this House and of the other House and of the two Houses acting in their legislative capacity as is the right of the President to veto a bill. We may decline to act and go no further; we need not initiate the legislation anew. If we could be compelled to do this, then the independence of each branch and the independence of the legislative power is absolutely gone, and you have no longer a majority rule for the President, and the minority can coerce legislation and thus the minority become the majority, and with an unscrupulous Executive cohering the power of the minority with patronage and place you have your Government revolutionized by the minority usurping and controlling the power of the majority, in which, under our system, it is vested by the Constitution and the laws. This is the inevitable result. There is no such power anywhere. It belongs to the legislative branch to act or to decline to act. When it does decline to act, it is exercising a plain, clear, constitutional right, and it must act, as must the Executive act, in full view of its responsibilities to the people. That is where the responsibility comes at last. The power to do this is with us, but we must act in the view that it is ultimately to be judged of by the last tribunal in this country, the tribunal of the people, and if we are not standing by doctrines and measures which the people will approve, if we are not maintaining the rights and the liberties and the ancient freedom of this people, they will not sustain us, and they ought not; but if, on the contrary, we decline to act, in obedience to our clear constitutional right, in defense of the rights and liberties and privileges of a free people, they will sustain us, and this Congress will write upon the history of this people an ineffaceable record that their representatives in the Forty-sixth Congress were true to the liberties of the American people.

Sir, each must be responsible for its conclusions and its actions to the people themselves, and each must act in full view of that ultimate tribunal. The power of the legislative branch to raise armies and vote supplies is to be exercised as that legislative branch judges wise. There is no power to control, to direct, or to coerce it. If the Executive differs, his negative controls unless two-thirds overrule it. If not, the bill falls, but his negative does not compel us to act.

Sir, this mode of coercion never was intended to be used upon the legislative branch. There is nothing in the Constitution or in the history of this people that can be construed to mean that the legislative branch shall act at the dictation of the Executive; it is not found in nor system anywhere, and it cannot be cited to deter us from that which is a plain, clear duty.

The independence of the legislative branch and the rights of the people are often to be preserved best by this defensive power of non-action. The Senator from Maine read from Mr. Clay. Let me read what he said in 1819, upon a question of constitutional interpretation upon an Army-bill, an issue between the President and him as to what should be put upon that bill in regard to internal improvements. Mr. Trimble had moved an amendment allowing troops to be used to make a road and appropriating money for that purpose. This involved the question of internal improvements. Mr. Clay, who was then Speaker, when the House was in Committee of the Whole, said this:

Mr. Clay hoped that this motion would not be insisted on, and, if insisted on, would not prevail. The object in view was to present the simple, unmixed proposition whether the Executive has the power to employ the money of the country in constructing roads; if associated with the company proposed, (the amendment,) it would make the sense of the committee equivocal on the important question presented by the motion of Mr. Trimble. For that motion, Mr. Clay said, he meant to vote. It would declare by a formal act that it was competent, by the grants of power, for Congress to authorize such works. Mr. Clay said he thought Congress had been wanting in its duty in delaying so long to legislate on this subject. It was proper to pass a bill and present it to the President, and if he refused to sanction it, then, Mr. Clay declared, he had no hesitation in avowing he should be ready to proceed to hostilities with the President on this point, and withhold every appropriation until he conceded the point.

That was in January, 1819. Another argument has been made use of in regard to the exercise of the negative of the President, which it seems to me is without foundation: that is, that he has the right to judge at all times and under all circumstances of the character of the legislation that he shall veto. Where this power is used upon a bill that he judges to be unconstitutional, or is hasty, unwise, or improper legislation, then it is very clear that he has this right, and he ought to have it. But when in the history of this Government was he ever called upon to or did any President ever veto a repealing statute? When, where, under what circumstances, in what condition of affairs, did the President of the United States ever veto a bill that repealed a law which clothed him with power and took it from the people? When and where did any President of the United States ever veto a bill to repeal a law that gave to him control to send troops to the places of election with the power to coerce the people and take from them their rights? When and where has the President ever vetoed a bill giving the people of this country any of their liberties, or repealing a statute which took from them their rights? There are none such, and the people will never sustain such action.

The Executive negative practically refers the question to the people, and to them we and he must appeal. This power never was intended to be used to keep a yoke on the people or to destroy a repealing statute. Ordinarily the people sustain vetoes. Why? Because of the refusal by the Executive to accept power wrung from the people; but suppose you reverse this and by your repealing statute give to the Executive more power, which power is wrung from the States and the people, then there comes an entirely different question; and I tell Senators that we can face the ultimate tribunal of the people in denying supplies to the Executive power on a bill which gives back to them a great cardinal right. In such a case we will have the old question of kingly prerogative against popular right; and upon that issue we can go to the people with perfect confidence and safety.

But is it not a strange argument that the legislative power which controls the purse, and through that the sword, has no right to say how troops are to be used; that the legislative power is not to have any control over this subject? It seems to me this is a very singular argument. The purse was given to the legislative power to control the sword, and they go together, and the rights and the liberties of this people are to be taken care of by their immediate representatives and the representatives of the States in this Chamber as the legislative power of the country, and when an attempt is made to coerce them from an effort to restore to the people their plain, clear rights, a new issue is made up, and one that we can very well place ourselves upon.

Sir, the veto power never was intended and never has been used to deprive the people of free elections or to strike down any other of the cardinal rights of a free people. When it is used for such a purpose we may with implicit trust await the verdict of a betrayed and outraged people. If it be to such a result in such a cause the American people are invited, the legislative majority in Congress will aid in writing upon the pages of our history a new and startling proof of the proud determination of American freeman to defend and maintain their own system of free elections.

Sir, we were never called to a plainer or more imperative duty, and we should be faithless if we faltered in its performance. The restoration of the liberties of the people, of the landmarks of civil liberty; the removal of the burdens that have come to this people from the changed condition which four years of civil war brought upon them; a restoration to them of the rights that that changed condition deprived them of, is our sole purpose in this bill. We have no other. We should not be true to the people if we had any other. No department of this Government has the right to resist our constitutional demand for the repeal of this menace to free government, which it is, as it stands upon the statute-book to-day. Sir, some writer has said our liberties are traceable through one thousand years' of English and American history. They are the possessions of those who ever advance, not by senseless clinging to the present, but by holding, repairing, improving, grasping the good of the present, remodeling the political fabric when decay is present, and improving at every step of essential progress.

Many of the best changes of later times have been made in casting aside innovations, removing the débris that time and tyranny have fastened upon the sturdy base, and in advancing by falling back upon original principles. The great charter, the petition of right, the bill of rights, and the Declaration of Independence contained nothing new in either. They were but the reassertion of the old, the resuscitation of the rights of the people. In all great political struggles it is not new laws or new principles that prevail and give form, force, and coherence to the victorious party, but better redress of grievances, more faithful observance of laws, and a restoration of the rights and privileges of the masses which by neglect or from oppression or misrule have become lost, obscured, or denied. This great right of free elections has been menaced, obscured, and denied.

The disputed section of this bill is an effort by the legislative power of this Congress to return to original principles.

This great right menaced by these statutes, the control of which never belonged to the Federal Government but always has belonged to the people and the States, has been menaced, obscured, and denied, and the disputed section in this bill is simply an effort by the legislative power of this Congress to return to original principles; its purpose is to restore the military to strict subordination to the civil power, to permit a free system of laws to be based again upon a free ballot everywhere, and to expunge from the statute-book a menace to free institutions.

Mr. LOGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator from Illinois will give way, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LOGAN. I yield for that motion.

Mr. FERRY. I make that motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope not. Let us go on with the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The motion is not debatable.

Mr. FERRY. I hope the Senator from West Virginia will not object. I make the motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, we have now consumed several days adjourning over repeatedly, and I see no reason why we cannot go on with the bill an hour or two yet; at least an hour, and then go into executive session if Senators wish. If there is any gentleman ready to speak, let him go on; if not, let us take a vote. I think this delay is unnecessary.

Mr. FERRY. I insist on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, it was declared that the affirmative prevailed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have no wish——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator dispute the vote?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes, sir. I ask for the yeas and nays, and then I have a right to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I beg pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business the yeas and nays are requested.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CONKLING, (when his name was called.) The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] is detained by illness to-day, and I am paired with him on all political questions. Whether this be a political question or not, I do not know. I think I had better not vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] on political questions. If he were present, I suppose he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] Not knowing how he would vote on this motion, I decline to vote.

The Secretary concluded the roll-call.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand from the colleague of Senator HARRIS [Mr. BAILEY] that he does not regard this as one of the subjects within our pair, and I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. PLUMB, (after having voted in the negative.) I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. WALKER.]

Mr. BURNSIDE, (who had voted in the affirmative.) I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired, and I do not know whether I ought to vote or not.

The result of the vote was announced—yeas 36, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—36.

Allison,	Chandler,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,
Anthony,	Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Paddock,

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 14, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at five minutes past twelve o'clock. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States and Territories, commencing with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to appropriate committees, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider. Under this call joint resolutions and memorials of State and territorial Legislatures are in order.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I ask unanimous consent that the call of States and Territories be continued until the list is gone through.

Mr. BROWNE. I object.

Mr. CASWELL. Before the call of States proceeds I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Gunther, treasurer of the State of Wisconsin, be admitted to the floor during the present week.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman later to make that request. The Chair has never allowed any request for unanimous consent to interfere with the call of States in the morning hour of Monday.

STANDARD SILVER DOLLARS.

Mr. LADD. I desire to introduce the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill to authorize the owner of silver bullion to have it coined into standard silver dollars, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to raise at this time a question of order. I wish to know whether the rule requiring one day's notice of the introduction of bills will be held by the Chair to apply to the introduction of bills on Monday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause Rule 52 to be read.

Mr. VANCE. Owing to the confusion in the Hall we do not hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order.

The Clerk read as follows:

52. Reports from committees having been presented and disposed of, the Speaker shall call for resolutions from the Members of each State and Delegate from each Territory, beginning with Maine and the Territory last organized, alternately; and they shall not be debated on the very day of their being presented, nor on any day assigned by the House for the receipt of resolutions, unless where the House shall direct otherwise, but shall lie on the table, to be taken up in the order in which they were presented; and if on any day the whole of the States and Territories shall not be called, the Speaker shall begin on the next day where he left off the previous day: Provided, That no member shall offer more than one resolution, or one series of resolutions, all relating to the same subject, until all the States and Territories shall have been called.—January 14, 1829.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will also cause to be read Rule 115.

The Clerk read as follows:

115. Every bill shall be introduced on the report of a committee or by motion for leave. In the latter case, at least one day's notice shall be given of the motion in the House, or by filing a memorandum thereof with the Clerk, and having it entered on the Journal; and the motion shall be made and the bill introduced, if leave is given, when resolutions are called for; such motion, or the bill when introduced, may be committed.—April 7, 1789; September 15, 1837; and March 2, 1838. But the Speaker shall not entertain a motion for leave to introduce a bill or joint resolution for the establishment or change of post-routes, and all propositions relating thereto shall be referred, under the rule, like petitions and other papers, to the appropriate committee.—May 5, 1870.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan will be kind enough to state again the point of order which he raises.

Mr. CONGER. I understand that the rule assigns the morning hour after the reading of the Journal on Monday for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions——

The SPEAKER. That is under Rule 130.

Mr. CONGER. On leave. The inquiry I make is whether this rule saying "on leave" requires the one day's notice as in the case of other bills?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that the point comes up at all in this connection of the morning hour of Monday, because the morning hour of Monday is distinctly provided for in Rule 130.

Mr. CONGER. The question has never been raised so far as I am aware, and I thought it well to bring it now to the attention of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The same language is used in Rule 130, "bills on leave." The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

130. All the States and Territories shall be called for bills on leave and resolutions every Monday during each session of Congress; and, if necessary to secure the object on said days, all resolutions which shall give rise to debate shall lie over for discussion, under the rules of the House already established; and the whole of said days shall be appropriated to bills on leave and resolutions, until all the States and Territories are called through.—February 6, 1838. And the Speaker shall first call the States and Territories for bills on leave; and all bills so introduced during the first hour after the Journal is read shall be referred, without debate, to their appropriate committees: Provided, however, That a bill so introduced and referred, and all bills at any time introduced by unanimous consent and referred, shall not be brought back into the House upon a motion to reconsider.—March 16, 1860, and January 11, 1872. And on said call joint resolutions of State and territoral Legislatures for printing and reference may be introduced.—January 11, 1867.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will also cause to be read Rule 145.

The Clerk read as follows:

145. No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor—November 13, 1794; nor shall any rule be suspended, except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present—March 13, 1822; nor shall the order of business, as established by the rules, be postponed or changed, except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present; nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules except during the last six days of the session, and on Monday of every week at the expiration of one hour after the Journal is read—April 26, 1828, and June 22, 1874—unless the call of States and Territories for bills on leave and resolutions has been earlier concluded, when the Speaker may entertain a motion to suspend the rules.—June 8, 1864.

The SPEAKER. The very words the gentleman mentions are used in Rule 130, "bills on leave." Rule 145 provides that after one hour shall have been consumed on a Monday by the introduction of bills on leave and joint resolutions for reference, it is then competent for any member to move for a suspension of the rules.

Mr. CONGER. I think it important to have the point settled. I do not know that it has been raised at any time during the ten years I have been in Congress. The point I make is, that even to introduce a bill on leave during the morning hour of Monday one day's notice must have been given, because the morning hour of Monday is assigned especially to the introduction of "bills on leave." Another rule directs how bills on leave may be introduced, and says that there must be one day's notice given. And in order that there may be a decision of that question I make a point of order on this bill that there has not been one day's notice given of the intention of the member to introduce it.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman be kind enough to refer the Chair to the rule upon that subject?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Pending this point of order I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Under the existing rules of the House the representative of any idea can, upon petition going through the petition-box, have every matter that may be embraced in a bill referred to a committee, so that it may be acted upon by that committee.

The SPEAKER. That is under another rule.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Therefore the objection made on the other side is simply as to the mode or manner in which, for instance, the greenback men or the tariff men may bring their ideas before the House.

The SPEAKER. Any citizen of the United States has the right to petition Congress, and the rule provides how that right shall be exercised.

Mr. CONGER. I am speaking of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. CONGER. And, therefore, there is no need of any criticism upon my method of doing it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not criticise the gentleman.

Mr. CONGER. I refer to remarks made by a gentleman on the other side. I now call the attention of the Chair to Rule 115.

The SPEAKER. That rule has already been read.

Mr. CONGER. I know that; but the Chair asked me to refer to the rule on which I based my point of order. Rule 115 says:

Every bill shall be introduced on the report of a committee or by motion for leave.

I call the attention of the Chair especially now to these words:

In the latter case [by motion on leave] at least one day's notice shall be given of the motion in the House, or by filing a memorandum thereof with the Clerk and having it entered on the Journal.

That is where bills are introduced on leave. There are only two ways that I know of under the rules to bring bills before this House: one is by the report of a committee, and the other is "by motion on leave." When they are introduced by "motion on leave," then Rule 115 provides that there shall be at least one day's notice in the House, or a memorandum entered upon the Journal to that effect.

As to this bill I raise the question, because it is very important that we should know what our rules are. I make the point against the introduction of this bill that there has been no notice given of its introduction so far as I know, either by the member himself in his place in this House or by the filing of a memorandum with the Clerk. If there has been no such notice I make the objection to the introduction of the bill that it is not entitled under the rule to be now received.

Mr. REED. The point as I understand, and which attracted my attention some time ago, is this: all the rules of the House are to be construed together and in unison. One rule of the House says that the morning hour of Monday shall be devoted to the introduction and reference of "bills on leave." Rule 115 says that there are two ways of introducing a bill: first by report from committee, and second "by motion on leave." And then it provides that in order to introduce a bill "on leave" one day's notice should be given. Rule 130 does not seem to change or repeal Rule 115 at all. Therefore whatever bills are introduced during the morning hour of Monday on leave under Rule 130 must be bills which have complied with the formalities required by Rule 115.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] himself who raises the point has stated that during his ten years' service here he has never known this point to be raised.

Mr. COX. It never has been.

The SPEAKER. Neither does the Chair recollect at present of any instance where the point has been raised during his sixteen years' service here. In this connection the Chair desires to have read some paragraphs from the Manual.

Mr. CONGER. On what page?

The SPEAKER. On page 165.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bills on leave, when and how introduced; what bills not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.—Rule 130, page 132.

The notice referred to in Rule 115 is rarely given in the House, (it being in order to give it then only when resolutions are in order,) but is usually given to the Clerk, by sending to him a written memorandum in this form: "Mr. —— gives notice that to-morrow, or on some subsequent day, he will ask leave to introduce a bill, [here insert its title."] If the member desires his notice to appear in the newspaper report of the proceedings of the House, he should furnish the reporter of such paper with a copy of the memorandum furnished the Clerk. Having given this notice, it is then in order, on any subsequent day, when bills on leave and resolutions are being called for, and when his particular State is called, to move for leave to introduce his bill.

The SPEAKER. Rule 130 was enacted many years after Rule 115, and the uniform practice of this House has been to allow on Monday the introduction of bills in the manner proposed by the gentleman from Maine whom the Chair has recognized. The very words "bills on leave" are used in the rule, so that this recognition would seem by the rule to include the very words "bills on leave." The House met to-day by direct vote for the purpose of introducing bills for reference. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. In order that this decision, which may become a precedent, may have the sanction of the House, I appeal from the decision of the Chair; and——

Mr. COX. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman is more in a hurry than usual this morning. I am on the floor at present. If my friend will wait——

Mr. COX. I am in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] will be kind enough to reduce his appeal to writing, so that there may be no mistake about it.

Mr. COX. After I have moved to lay the appeal on the table the gentleman from Michigan goes on to discuss the question and calls me to account.

Mr. CONGER. If the Chair will furnish me with a copy of his decision I will write out my appeal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated his decision; and the rule requires that an appeal shall be in writing. The Chair, however, will not insist upon his suggestion.

Mr. CONGER. I wished to be perfectly accurate in stating my appeal, and therefore I made my request of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knew the wish of the gentleman, and that is the reason he suggested that the appeal should be in writing.

Mr. COX. Does this come out of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. COX. Then it may consume the whole hour.

Mr. CONGER. The point I made was, that there should be notice of a bill which it is proposed to introduce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the point to be this: that under Rule 115 one day's notice must be given of a bill sought to be introduced in the manner proposed by the gentleman from Maine, and which the Chair has recognized as his right.

Mr. CONGER. My point referred to bills introduced in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood. The Chair has overruled the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. Now, from that decision of the Chair I appeal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. COX. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan appeals from the decision of the Chair, and the gentleman from New York moves to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. STEPHENS. I hope the gentleman from New York will allow me one moment. I think that the decision of the Chair is clearly right upon principle under the language of the rule, and also clearly right according to the uniform practice of this House for the last six years—I will not undertake to say how much longer. As the Chair has stated, Rule 115 was adopted long before Rule 130; therefore Rule 130 must supersede and override Rule 115 if there is any conflict between the two rules.

One word more, Mr. Speaker. It is wholly immaterial in my view how the Speaker or the House may decide this question. The gentleman from Maine or any other gentleman can without introducing any bill formally introduce whatever legislation he wishes by the mere presentation of a petition and the reference of it to any designated committee. I have myself offered to-day in the form of a petition which has gone into the box all the legislation that I desire at the present time to introduce. Every other member may do the same. If the gentleman from Michigan should be sustained by this House in his appeal, the gentleman from Maine can introduce this same proposition or any other legislation in the form of a petition. The great right of petition has been established in this House in years gone by. Any citizen of the United States has the right to ask legislation upon any subject he may deem proper and to have it referred to an appropriate committee.

Mr. COX. I now insist on my motion.

Mr. CONGER. I do not yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. The gentleman wishes to consume the hour. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from New York, I suppose, cannot take away my time by injecting a motion of that kind while I have the floor.

Mr. ELAM. An appeal from the decision of the Chair is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. It is debatable. Rule 2 will be read.

Mr. CONGER. I was speaking upon my motion when the gentleman from New York without my consent undertook to take me from the floor.

Mr. COX. I do not wish to be discourteous to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause Rule 2 to be read, with the note to be found in connection with it in the Manual.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. He shall preserve order and decorum; may speak to points of order in preference to other members, rising from his seat for that purpose; and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the House by any two members.—April 7, 1789; on which appeal no member shall speak more than once, unless by leave of the House.—December 23, 1811.

NOTE—[Difficulties have often arisen as to a supposed discrepancy between the appeal contemplated in this rule and that referred to in Rule 61. There is no discrepancy. The question of order mentioned in the second rule relates to motions or propositions, their applicability or relevancy, or their admissibility on the score of time, or in the order of business, &c. The "call to order," mentioned in Rule 61, on which, in case of an appeal, there can be no debate, has reference only to "transgressions of the rules in speaking," or to indecorum of any kind. See also Rule 133, in which debate on an appeal, pending a call for the previous question, is prohibited.]

Mr. CONGER. Now, after the interruptions which have been made I should like to go on with my remarks. The gentleman from New York of course ought not to interpose his proposition while I am on the floor, and he is too old a member to take a young member like myself by surprise. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I have never been surprised at the gentleman and he has never been surprised at me. If the gentleman has not yielded the floor I cannot make my motion and he can go on.

Mr. CONGER. I told the gentleman that I did not wish to yield to him now. But if the gentleman wishes to speak to the question I will yield to him for five minutes.

Mr. COX. I do not want to take up this hour. I think that is the gentleman's object.

Mr. CONGER. No; I wish the gentleman to take up five minutes if he wishes.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman yields me the floor I will move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. CONGER. I will allow that motion to be made when I take my seat.

Now, I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that for many years while I have been in this House the question has never been raised which has been raised now so far as I know and which the Chair has decided. I think, however, I am mistaken in that supposition. I am informed by gentlemen that the question was raised, Mr. Speaker, when your predecessor [Mr. BLAINE] was in the chair, and that he ruled—and it will be found among the rulings; perhaps the Clerk may have the ruling of Speaker BLAINE, as he has the record of all these decisions—by which the precedent was established that notice must be given of the introduction of bills even in the morning hour on Monday. I have been so informed, at least since I made the remark that the question was at least a new one to me. I cannot see any difference about bills introduced in the morning hour or at any other time.

Instead of any implication arising in the rule in regard to the morning hour that they may be introduced without notice I think that the rule says introduced "by leave;" and where Rule 115 says there are only two ways of introducing these bills—from a committee and by leave—followed by the rule that there must be notice given, I should rather infer that when the rule for the morning hour was established and the words "by leave" put in it was meant to confine the introduction of bills to the rule requiring notice. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman an hour to yield? Does he take up all this hour on an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. REED. I address the Speaker in my own right.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CONGER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine if he wishes it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine claims the floor in his own right and the Chair claims the right to recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CONGER. Then I do not yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. It is too late.

Mr. CONGER. Oh, no!

Mr. REED. I addressed the Speaker on the leave granted to me by the gentleman from New York twice and the Speaker paid no attention to me.

The SPEAKER. On the contrary the Chair recognized the gentleman and he said that he spoke in his own right and the Chair then recognized the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED. I addressed the Chair, and there can be no question between the Chair and myself about the fact. I have no doubt the Chair will recognize it as I do. I addressed the Chair twice under the permission given me by the gentleman from Michigan, but the Chair instead of calling my name and recognizing me turned to the gentleman from New York, and as objection was made as to my right I claimed it under the permission of the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not tell the whole story.

Mr. REED. If the Chair will permit me——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] said in that connection that he claimed the floor in his own right.

Mr. REED. If the Chair will permit me I did it under the supposition that the gentleman from Michigan had no right to yield the floor to me, and it was only on that supposition that I made the suggestion.

Now, I do not think the Chair ought to be sharp with me, if I can use that phrase; I do not think the Chair ought to be sharp with me on that ground. I ask the privilege of addressing the House on the point of order for not more than five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman knows, and the House knows, that the practice of the Chair has been to go from side to side, and the gentleman from Michigan having been heard, he was entitled to recognize a gentleman on the other side.

Mr. REED. But the gentleman from Michigan yielded to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine stated—and perhaps, to use the gentleman's own phrase, he may have been too sharp for his own purpose—that he claimed the floor in his own right.

Mr. REED. I had addressed the Chair twice under the permission extended to me by the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair has the right under the rule, and the recent action of the House confirms such right, to exercise his discretion as to recognition.

Mr. COX. For the last twenty years I have been trying to get the floor, [laughter,] and every time gentlemen on the other side attempt to prevent me from doing so.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to know who has the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. CONGER. I have not yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman says he has not yielded the floor——

Mr. CONGER. I yielded five minutes to the gentleman from Maine. I offered to yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York. But, as I understand, I have given the Chair no indication that I yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman gave no indication that he yielded the floor absolutely, except in so far as he handed the floor over to the gentleman from Maine, who then declared that he claimed recognition in his own right. It was for that reason that the Chair went to the other side.

Mr. CONGER. Then I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. I do not take five minutes from the gentleman from Michigan. I take the floor in the right which the Speaker has to give it to me. I say to the House these motions, these speeches, this appeal from the decision of the Chair on a matter which has been thoroughly settled for more than twenty years is simply a matter of dilatory movement, nothing more, nothing less, to absorb the hour.

Mr. CONGER. Suppose it is, what then?

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to interrupt the gentleman from New York. The gentleman from Michigan claims the floor, stating that he had not yielded it.

Mr. CONGER. I stated that I yielded five minutes to the gentleman from Maine.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will, in the fullest spirit of harmony, recognize the gentleman from Maine for five minutes.

Mr. REED. I am much obliged to the Chair.

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. I do not ask the gentleman to yield to me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the gentleman from Maine has a clear right; but that there may be no complaint whatever, he recognizes that gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. REED. I address the House on the question of order simply because I think the point which has been made is a legitimate and correct one.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not said it is illegitimate. On the contrary——

Mr. REED. I mean no reflection on the Chair or anybody else. I mean to say I confine myself to the point of order which has been raised.

Now, by Rule 115 of the rules of the House it is provided that bills shall be introduced in but two ways; one on the report of a committee and the other on leave. The rules provide that on Monday the States shall be called for the introduction of bills of one class, and that one class is specified in Rule 130 to be bills on leave. Consequently nothing can be introduced on Monday except bills on leave. Bills on leave are bills that are introduced by leave of the House; and by Rule 115 bills that are introduced by leave of the House must have one day's notice. And instead of the practice having been settled to the contrary for the last twenty years, as the gentleman from New York says, the Journal Clerk, who has the making up of the digest, has inserted in Rule 130 a reference to Rule 115, declaring that it is required that at least one day's notice shall be given of the motion to introduce a bill on leave. This is under Rule 130, which provides for the Monday introduction of bills. And on page 165, with the same reference to Rule 130, page 134, is a full note taken from Barclay's Digest, which corresponds exactly with the proposition that has been sustained by the gentleman from Michigan. And although it has not been customary to object, and it has been very seldom done, nevertheless it is in the power of a member to make the objection. And I am very glad that it has been brought out here that it is in the power of every citizen of the United States by means of petition to introduce any subject for reference to the appropriate committee, so that there is no blocking of anything. It is a pure question of parliamentary law, and a decision on the part of this House as to what the rules of the House mean; and I hope this may be disposed of without any reference to either political or financial opinions, because it involves neither of them.

Mr. COX. The uniform custom, as the Chair has stated, has been on Monday morning, in the morning hour, to have bills introduced without formal notice having been given thereof. Everybody knows that to be the rule.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] appeals from the decision of the Chair, and I move to lay the appeal on the table. As I want a morning hour, I will not debate the question further.

The question was taken on Mr. COX's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 107, noes 77.

Mr. CONGER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to facilitate business, and therefore I call for the yeas and nays. It is only a question of time when we are to have them.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 75, not voting 72; as follows:

Mr. CONGER. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. Not quite.

Mr. CONGER. Then I think we had better read a while.

The Clerk proceeded to read the roll and was interrupted by

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the object which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has in view has been accomplished and the Chair would like to announce the result of the vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. CONGER. The morning hour has now expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] reminds the Chair that the morning hour has expired, and the Chair recognizes the fact.

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to inquire of the Speaker in regard to Rule 115, and also the ruling in Smith's Manual, page 163, in the following words:

If, instead of waiting for an opportunity to introduce his bill on leave, the member would file his petition, or whatever other matter he may have in favor of the proposed legislation, and have it referred to the appropriate committee, as he may do on any day under Rule 131, (see Petitions,) he will thus have the subject before them, and will get a bill reported as speedily as if it had been originally referred. Besides, the bill thus reported comes before the House unincumbered with amendments, as is not likely to be the case with a bill previously referred. These suggestions of course do not apply to cases where the immediate passage of a bill without the intervention of a committee is sought for, or where it is desirable to refer it to a select committee.

The point I desire to inquire is, whether a member may not now put in a petition-box a memorial requesting the passage of the bill thereunto attached and let that petition be referred to an appropriate committee under the rules as a petition, and whether that committee may not report whenever they are called or, as in case of the Committees on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, on Banking and Currency, or on Ways and Means, at any time such bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman to make the inquiry whether a petition presented and put into the box under the rule leaves the subject-matter of that petition within the authority of the committee of the House to which it may be referred, to report by bill or otherwise in relation to the subject, or whether a petition presented is required under the rules to be referred to a committee in open House.

Mr. SPRINGER. Especially where the petition is accompanied by the bill, and the prayer of the memorialist is that the bill attached to the petition which is put into the box shall be passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair as a rule never decides a point of order until it arises. The case indicated by the gentleman is not now presented. The question might come up when a report is proposed to be made from a committee, based upon a reference of subject as stated and when the right to make such report is questioned.

Mr. CONGER. That case not arising now, I call for the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would ask the Speaker to rule upon a memorial which I now send to the Clerk's desk, for the purpose of having this question settled.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] asks unanimous consent to have read a memorial which he proposes to refer to a committee.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not ask unanimous consent for the reading of the memorial. I ask the Chair to rule upon the question of order so that the practice may now be settled by the House.

The SPEAKER. But a motion is now pending, provided for by the rules, to suspend the rules, including the rule under which the gentleman claims his right to present his memorial.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has a motion to suspend the rules been made?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, and the Chair is notified that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] desires to move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. WARNER. I would call the attention of the Chair to Rule 130, which provides that all the States and Territories shall be called for bills on leave and resolutions every Monday during each session of Congress, and if necessary to secure the object on said days.

The SPEAKER. That is a right under the rule to which the gentleman refers. There is a proposition pending to supersede that right by a suspension of all the rules, including Rule 130.

Mr. WARNER. That requires a two-thirds vote.

The SPEAKER. It does. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read a part of Rule 145.

The Clerk read as follows:

Except during the last six days of the session the Speaker shall not entertain a motion to suspend the rules at any time, except on Monday of every week at the expiration of one hour after the Journal is read, unless the call of States and Territories for bills on leave and resolutions has been earlier concluded, when the Speaker may entertain a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that in every case where there is a legitimate doubt as to the construction of a rule, that doubt should be decided so as to make the construction in accord with the uniform practice governing the House in the past.

Mr. REAGAN. What is that practice?

The SPEAKER. The practice has been to recognize motions to suspend the rules at the expiration of one hour after the reading of the Journal on Monday.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Before the States are called? The States have not been called yet for bills on leave.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] demands the regular order, which is the operation of Rule 145. It has been the uniform practice, at the expiration of one hour after the reading of the Journal, to recognize as in order motions to suspend the rules.

Mr. REAGAN. If the Chair recognizes a member for that purpose he may move a suspension of the rules. But if the Chair recognizes a member for the introduction of a bill——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is governed in his recognitions by the terms of the rules of course. A member who rises to move a suspension of the rules—which motion requires a two-thirds vote—is clearly to be preferred to one who claims the right—and in this instance a disputed and doubtful right—under a rule which it is proposed to suspend. The Chair has considered and construed this rule heretofore, and refers to his rulings thereon. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows from the Journal:

Mr. SPRINGER made the point of order that unless a motion be made to proceed to the regular order the question before the House was the bill of the House (H. R. No. 805) reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency by Mr. EWING.

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order on the ground that the morning hour was limited to sixty minutes, and that the bill named had taken its place in the morning hour, and could not be taken out except by unanimous consent. [November 1, 1877.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will also read another paragraph from the Journal.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER held that the resolution was before the House under Rule 130, which prescribed the mode of procedure during the morning hour of Monday, and that Rule 41 referred to related only to the mode and time of considering the subject already before the House and in effect related only to the order of business, and being long anterior in date to Rule 130 could not by inference nor by implication change the specific provisions of the latter rule adopted at a later date. [April 15, 1878.]

Mr. MONROE. I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ATKINS. Would it not be in order for me to move to suspend the rules so that the House shall now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has always decided that a motion to suspend the rules on Monday to proceed with public business would be recognized in preference to a motion to suspend the rules by any individual member.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair also decides that on a Monday such a motion requires a two-thirds vote to carry it.

Mr. EWING. Has not the Chair held that a person who moves to suspend the rules to proceed to the consideration of public business must have the instructions of his committee to make the motion?

Mr. ATKINS. That is rather a novel point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recollect having given such decision. Will the gentleman direct the attention of the Chair to any such ruling?

Mr. EWING. That is my recollection, that the Chair has ruled that a motion to suspend the rules to proceed to the consideration of public business must be made by instructions of the committee to the gentleman who makes the motion.

The SPEAKER. That is during the last six days of the session.

Mr. ATKINS. I call the attention of the Chair to Rule 119.

The SPEAKER. The equity of the theory of the Chair, as well as the practice under that theory, is that public business should always have preference.

Mr. EWING. Is it not all public business? When a motion is made by any Representative to suspend the rules it is to proceed with some public business.

The SPEAKER. Not necessarily.

Mr. EWING. It is all public business; and why should a gentleman who happens to be chairman of a committee and who acts upon his own motion without instructions from his committee—a gentleman who is not on the list for motions to suspend—why should such a gentleman have preference over those who are upon the list and who move to proceed with some public business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair under the action of the Committee on Rules, which was confirmed by the House, claims the right to recognize within his discretion.

Mr. GARFIELD. So far as I know, preference has always been given in recognitions by the Speaker to regular appropriation bills over all other business except privileged questions, such as election cases. I think that this is a wise exercise of the Speaker's discretion in regard to recognition of members desiring to move to suspend the rules. But I want to suggest that my colleague's proposition ought to be read, so that it shall be considered pending, even though the House may agree to the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

Mr. MONROE. I was about to ask that the resolution which I desire to have adopted under a suspension of the rules may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House, the business interests of the country require that no legislation changing the law in regard to currency or tariff should be passed at the present session of Congress.

Mr. WARNER. I object to that resolution.

Mr. ATKINS. I insist on my motion.

Mr. MONROE. I ask whether my resolution is not public business or in the nature of public business?

The SPEAKER. It is a mere expression of opinion on the part of the House—not legislation within the technical meaning of the term.

Mr. CONGER. But, Mr. Speaker, when the Chair has recognized a gentleman, as he has the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE,] for a motion to suspend the rules, I submit that such motion must have its preference; and when it is disposed of the Chair will recognize some other member. Certainly the Chair would not take off the floor a gentleman already recognized upon a motion to suspend the rules, although another member might desire to submit a motion of equal or higher privilege. When under the rules the Speaker has recognized a member whose name is on the list, to make a motion on which there can be no debate and which can be soon settled, I think it would be dangerous for the Chair to hold that he could withdraw his recognition and give the floor to another gentleman.

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Speaker, I have several times addressed the Chair. It was my wish to anticipate the call for the regular order. I want to direct the attention of the Chair to Rule 130. I understand the Chair to have ruled indirectly that under the wording of that rule one hour of sixty minutes is the whole time open to the House for the introduction of bills on leave and joint resolutions. Now, it is perfectly clear to me—and I submit the point to the Chair that he may, if he sees the force of my point, review his ruling—it is perfectly clear to me that under Rule 130 the entire day of Monday is to be given to the introduction of bills on leave and joint resolutions; that during the first hour there is to be no debate, bills going to their appropriate committees without discussion; but there remains the whole day for the consideration of resolutions and of bills on leave. Although I am as much determined as any other man on this floor to oppose in reference to the currency or any other questions any measure which I may think injudicious, I am altogether opposed to any construction of the rules of this House which shall prevent the fullest possible expression of opinion. If, as I contend, the day of Monday is by the rules given for the introduction of bills on leave and joint resolutions, I think it the duty of this House to give the fullest possible development to that class of business. How else can a fair opportunity be given for the introduction of bills and resolutions?

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires, in answer to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE,] to say that his ruling upon this subject is in accordance with the uniform practice of the House; and he repeats that where any doubt arises as to the construction of a rule, that doubt should be decided in the direction of accord with uniform practice and precedent. The gentleman from Maryland claims his right under the rules. Another rule of the House says that one hour after the reading of the Journal on Monday and during the last six days of the session motions may be made to suspend the rules; and such a motion, if carried, would suspend the rule under which the gentleman claims that the whole day shall be given to the introduction of bills, a construction not yet assented to by the Chair.

Mr. McLANE. The Chair will pardon me a moment. Rule 145—the rule to which the Chair refers and which regulates these motions to suspend the rules—says expressly that a standing rule of the House shall not be suspended without one day's notice.

The SPEAKER. Except by a two-thirds vote on Monday and during the last six days of the session. That is a part of the rule which the gentleman cites.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to another point of order on the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Ohio; and it is this: that it has for its object to suspend the rules for the purpose of changing and controlling the order of business of the House.

The SPEAKER. The object in view to suspend is not a question to be reviewed by the Chair.

Mr. REAGAN. Allow me a moment. We are here, as assumed by the Chair, although in my judgment it is not true, acting under the rules of the House, for they prescribe the order of business in the House, and we must therefore proceed while we hold those rules do govern us in reference to the disposition of business coming before the House in accordance with them, and this proceeding is not in accordance with those rules. We are a House of Representatives and not a town meeting, and a resolution that we shall not legislate is a resolution to abrogate the rules of this House as they relate to the introduction of bills, their reference, report upon them, and general action in that regard. If a rule of that kind can be adopted as stated, it would be in fact the subversion and overthrow of the rules of the House. It must under the rules be referred to the Committee on Rules and have at least one day's consideration.

The point of order I make, Mr. Speaker, is that the effect of this resolution is to subvert, overthrow, and "revolutionize"—to use the favorite language of the other side of the House—the mode of legislative procedure in this House; and it has no more force, no more effect under the rules of the House than such a declaration made by the town council of the city of Washington or the city of Richmond. Not a bit; it controls nobody.

Suppose we adopt such an abstract resolution, what will be its effect? It is a vain declaration, in the language of a great law writer, which can have no effect. It can control nobody else hereafter. It is a mere expression on an abstract proposition, not an expression upon any rule of the House or anything which this House has the right to act on. I therefore make the point of order that it cannot be received by the House.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, what is the question before the House?

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to proceed with the consideration of the legislative, etc., appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The manner of proceeding with the business of the House is provided for in the rules themselves, but this is a proposition to suspend that rule and all other rules which stand in the way.

Mr. REAGAN. But for a purpose, I submit, Mr. Speaker, illegal and contrary to the rules. It has no place here.

The SPEAKER. It is a motion by two-thirds to suspend the rules and pass the resolution to which the gentleman has alluded.

Mr. REAGAN. For what purpose?

The SPEAKER. The object the Chair is not to inquire.

Mr. REAGAN. The Chair has caused the resolution to be read for information of the House and it has been read, and now why should we go through the vain and useless work of suspending the rules of the House for the purpose of passing a resolution repealing the rules of the House and subverting the regular procedure under the rules?

The SPEAKER. It has been the practice under the motion to suspend the rules (provided for in the rules themselves) to do just what is here proposed by the gentleman from Ohio. The Chair recollects a very noticeable example when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] moved to suspend the rules and adopt a resolution in opposition to subsidies. The rules were then suspended and the resolution was adopted. The House has a right to express its opinion on any subject. It is not for the Chair to say whether the opinion is wise or unwise, right or wrong.

Mr. KELLEY. I rise to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KELLEY. The question is, whether the resolution when it comes to be voted on will be divisible?

The SPEAKER. It will not be divisible, as it is a motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution, which includes the rule allowing a division where two substantive propositions are made in a single motion.

Mr. MORRISON. If the resolution is before the House on a motion to suspend the rules and pass it, I then ask the gentleman from Ohio to so modify it as to substitute for the word "passed" the word "undertaken." And I make that suggestion for the reason that while I believe the law in relation to the tariff ought to be changed, yet I believe it cannot and will not be changed during the present extra session of Congress.

Mr. REAGAN. Nor during this Congress.

Mr. MORRISON. Nor perhaps during this Congress. Therefore I do not think the business interests of the country should be unnecessarily disturbed——

Mr. MONROE. I am willing to accept the gentleman's modification of my resolution, and will substitute for the word "passed" the word "undertaken."

Mr. MORRISON. I do not think the business interests of this country ought to be disturbed by any idle, unsuccessful, and futile attempt to change the tariff at this time. I think we must all admit that any offer to change the tariff now will be unsuccessful, for reasons not necessary to be stated, the fact being so apparent to all.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House to decide is as to the recognition of the gentleman from Ohio who has been recognized by the Chair to offer a resolution which has been read for information. At the same time the gentleman from Tennessee states that he rises to make a motion to suspend the rules and to proceed to the consideration of the general appropriation bill. The Chair, as he has already stated, always gives precedence to a motion to proceed to the consideration of the public business.

Mr. GARFIELD. But in this instance the motion has been made to suspend the rules, and the Chair cannot entertain two motions to suspend the rules at the same time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not done so. The resolution was read for information.

Mr. CONGER. But the gentleman from Ohio has been recognized to make his motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. After disposing of the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, the Chair can then recognize the resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I think, Mr. Speaker, that Rule 119 settles this question. That rule provides that general appropriation bills shall be in order in preference to any other bills of a public nature, unless otherwise ordered by a majority of the House. I insist, therefore, that the gentleman from Tennessee has a motion which has priority over the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that he withdraw his motion till this vote is taken, and we will then go on with the legislative bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee withdraw his motion.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir; I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MONROE. I ask the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution which has been read at the desk.

Mr. COX. I ask that the resolution may be again read.

Mr. MONROE. If I am at liberty to do so, I accept the modification proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON;] that is, to substitute the word "undertaken" for the word "passed."

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman also consent to strike out the words about tariff and currency, so that the resolution shall say that no legislation shall be undertaken?

Mr. MONROE. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be again read as modified.

The resolution, as modified by substituting the word "undertaken" for the word "passed," was read.

Mr. MONROE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 108, nays 118, not voting 60; as follows:

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask consent, at the request of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PIERCE,] that Hon. H. J. Hurd, Hon. J. A. Roberts, Hon. A. B. Hepburn, Hon. W. A. Johnson, and Hon. R. S. Palmer, members of the New York Legislature, may be allowed during their brief stay in the city to come upon the floor.

Mr. CASWELL. I ask the same privilege for Mr. Gunther, treasurer of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. WHITE. I object.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed with the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. KNOTT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to make a point of order upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

ISAAC R. HILL.

Mr. CARLISLE. Allow me to make a request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] to yield to me for a moment to present a resolution which I think will take but a moment to dispose of. It relates to the organization of the House.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Isaac R. Hill be employed as a messenger on the floor of the House of Representatives for the present Congress and until further ordered, under the direction of the Sergeant-at-Arms, at a salary of $1,800 a year, to be paid monthly by the Clerk of the House out of the contingent fund.

Mr. REAGAN. Why should that be done?

The SPEAKER. Under the rules any resolution making an appropriation from the contingent fund must of necessity go to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. BREWER. I object to the resolution.

Mr. CARLISLE. My purpose was, and I thought the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] would yield for that purpose, to move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that, this being a question relating to the organization of the House, he should recognize the gentleman from Kentucky to offer the resolution.

Mr. FORT. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will state why the resolution ought not to go to the Committee of Accounts, and what is the special reason for passing it.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order on a motion to suspend the rules. The Chair would allow debate by unanimous consent for a brief period.

Mr. CARLISLE. I have no disposition to debate the resolution. I merely want to respond to the question put by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT.] I introduced the resolution with the understanding that it was agreeable to gentlemen on both sides of the House. Many gentlemen who are informed of the services of Mr. Hill, whom they knew as an employé of the Forty-fifth Congress, deemed those services necessary for the transaction of business. I have no personal interest in the matter.

Mr. REAGAN. I would be very glad that the resolution should be referred to the Committee of Accounts. I do not like to increase the number of employés of the House without understanding the reason and necessity of so doing.

Mr. CARLISLE. I will ask, then, that the resolution be referred to the Committee of Accounts.

There was no objection, and the resolution was received and referred to the Committee of Accounts.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. ATKINS, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

Mr. EWING. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well. I move that the House adjourn. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] cannot make a point of order on that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to hear the point of order of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ATKINS. I have the right, I believe, to make the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The effect of the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] to adjourn is the withdrawal of his motion to suspend the rules, and there having been intervening business since the House voted upon a motion to adjourn the Chair will again submit that motion to the House.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to adjourn, the Chair will submit to the House sundry requests for the withdrawal of papers in cases where there have been no adverse reports:

Mr. JOHNSTON, in the cases of David Tenant, Watson and McGill, the Miller heirs, William V. Taylor, executor, and Donnan, administrator of —— Dunlap;

Mr. OVERTON, in the case of Charles H. Warner;

Mr. BEALE, in the case of Thomas W. Tansitt;

Mr. THOMPSON, in the cases of J. A. Briggs, (administrator of C. M. Briggs,) W. R. Boice, and A. S. Shotwell;

Mr. EVINS, in the case of Lacon R. Tillman;

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, in the case of Reuben H. Plass;

Mr. MCKENZIE, in the cases of Eliza K. Ashley and sureties of John P. Hall;

Mr. BRIGHAM, in the case of Frederick W. Posthoff;

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois, in the case of Leonora W. Marshall;

Mr. JONES, in the case of Rosanna Dischenger; and

Mr. CASWELL, in the case of the Fifth Baptist church, (colored,) Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. CONGER. Let those requests go into the RECORD, and if tomorrow there be no objection to them they can be granted.

The SPEAKER. They will lie over and be considered as pending.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MORSE, for ten days.

NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference and printing at this time upon the subject of epidemic diseases. It is one of great importance to the whole country, and does not involve any political questions.

Mr. CONGER. I think it very proper that the bill should be printed and referred.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 3) to increase the efficiency of the National Board of Health and to prevent the introduction into or spread within the United States of contagious and infectious diseases was introduced, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, a resolution to provide for the printing of additional copies of the report on the observations of the transit of Venus, made under the direction of the Navy Department, in December, 1874.

ADJOURNMENT.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. ATKINS, that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 96, noes 61.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. EWING called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and upon a division there were—ayes 37, noes 88.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 92, not voting 71; as follows:

The SECRETARY OF THE SENATE.

What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. Secretary, as the Senate is very thin, I hope that we shall postpone the election of a President pro tempore for a few moments by common consent, and that the Journal may be read, so that the Senate may fill up before we proceed.

Mr. HAMLIN. We need not have the Journal read, but can wait as we are.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Very well; as the Senator from Maine suggests, let us remain in our seats for a few minutes.

Mr. WALLACE. I suggest an informal recess for ten minutes, until the Senate shall fill up.

The SECRETARY. By unanimous consent, a recess will be taken for ten minutes.

At the expiration of the recess (at twelve o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate was called to order by the Secretary.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. Secretary, I submit the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That in the absence of the Vice-President, Hon. ALLEN G. THURMAN be, and he is hereby, chosen President of the Senate pro tempore.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Secretary, I move to amend the resolution by striking out the name "ALLEN G. THURMAN" and substituting "THOMAS W. FERRY."

The SECRETARY. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. WALLACE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EATON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] Were he here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST,] who is detained by illness. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] on this question. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (after having voted "yea.") On all such questions I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN.] I voted in the affirmative and desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. BECK, (after having voted "nay.") On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] I forgot that for the moment when I voted, and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to announce, as has already been announced by the Senator from Kansas, that my colleague [Mr. VEST] is paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] My colleague is detained from the Senate by severe indisposition. Were he here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BAILEY. My colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is paired on all political questions with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Allison,	Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Chandler,	Kirkwood,	Saunders,

So the amendment was rejected.

The SECRETARY. The question recurs upon the original resolution of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN was escorted by Mr. FERRY to the chair, on taking which as President pro tempore he said:

Senators, it is only necessary for me to say, in the fewest possible words, that I sincerely thank you for this mark of your confidence and esteem. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings will now be read.

THE JOURNAL.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, I offer the customary resolution to notify the President of the United States and the House of Representatives of the election by the Senate of a President pro tempore.

The resolution was read.

Mr. HOAR. I submit that no business is to be transacted until after reading the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the Journal is the first business in order.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT, ETC.

Mr. WALLACE. I now call for action on the resolution submitted by me a moment ago.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that, in the absence of the Vice-President, the Senate has chosen Hon. ALLEN G. THURMAN, a Senator from the State of Ohio, President of the Senate pro tempore; and that he make a similar communication to the House of Representatives.

MOLINE WATER-POWER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the War Department, which will be reported.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, April 10, 1879.

The Secretary of War has the honor to submit to the United States Senate, with accompanying papers, a letter from the Chief of Ordnance upon the subject of leasing the water-power at Moline, Illinois, to the Moline Water-Power Company, as authorized in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1879.

That officer is of the opinion that in view of the magnitude of the public interests involved, no such lease should be entered into, but that an appropriation should be made to enable the War Department to maintain the water-power. I concur in his views and recommend that an adequate appropriation be made for its maintenance by the United States.

GEORGE W. McCRARY,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT of the United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To which committee shall the communication be referred?

Mr. EATON. I move that it lie upon the table.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that it had better go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. EATON. The bill is on the Calendar now.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well, then, that is the right course to be pursued.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will lie on the table with the accompanying documents.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the communication with the accompanying papers be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT WATER SUPPLY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the 7th instant, a schedule of water rents charged and collected in the District; which, on motion of Mr. ANTHONY, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of an appropriation by Congress for the establishment of a light-house at the mouth of the Manistee River on the shore of Lake Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present a memorial from John Beeson, familiarly known as Father Beeson, whose labors among the Indians are so well known, representing that war is imminent with the Indians and the settlers in Oregon, Colorado, and Alaska, and their surrounding territory. He further represents that "the forced removal of the Nez Percés and Sioux, and the difficulties with the Bannocks and the Cheyennes, consequent upon the violation of their treaties, has destroyed their confidence in the justice of the Government." Therefore the memorialist prays that "a peace commission, composed of such persons as can command the confidence alike of both races, may be appointed by the President of the United States to confer with the different tribes on the terms for the adjustment of existing difficulties, and to arrange for the consolidation upon fewer reserves of such as desire to move from their present location, as proposed by the Indian Bureau." I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROLLINS presented the memorial of Rufus Ingalls and others, officers of the Quartermaster's Department, United States Army, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 192) to correct the date of commission of certain officers of the Quartermaster's Department; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of John Davison, late private in Company C, Forty-seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteers, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Missouri; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, as follows:

Joint and concurrent resolution requesting Senators and Representatives in Congress to vote for and use all means in their representative capacity to establish an efficient and stable government in the Indian Territory.

Resolved, First. That we demand that the Government of the United States shall no longer nurture and sustain barbarism on the border of our State; that the long and persistent refusal of Congress to establish within the Indian Territory any civilized government or courts or appliance or requisites of civilization, is alike unjust to the people of Missouri, of the city of Saint Louis, and to the Indians residing within that Territory; that thereby all citizens are deprived of the trade and benefit which a country of unequaled fertility, larger in its area than the State of New York or Pennsylvania, is susceptible of producing, while the steady maintenance of its present condition operates as a barrier to the progress of our people, in opening up avenues to reach the trade of the vast and rich regions West and Southwest, and by the exclusion of the Indians from contact with civilization, and in failing to provide them with a stable government calculated to promote self-civilization, they are held in continued barbarism, and their country made the refuge of the lawless and the theater of lawlessness.

Second. That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are requested to use their best efforts to procure such legislation as will tend to establish an efficient and stable government in the Indian Territory, and render it more than a desert waste to our railroads, and a stumbling-block to the enterprise of our people.

Approved April 11, 1879.

MICHAEL K. McGRATH,
Secretary of State.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair appoints the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BELL] to fill the vacancies on both committees.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the Senate to excuse me from further service upon the Select Committee of the Senate to consider claims against the Nicaraguan government.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope not.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the Senator from Maine will at least let his request lie over until some of his friends can confer with him. He is chairman of that committee, and if it does not incommode him, I should be glad that the request might stand for a day.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have no objection to its standing for a day, but I assure my friend from New York that it will not produce any change.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator shows his ignorance of what we are going to say to him when he makes that remark.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 17) authorizing the printing of a portrait of the late Joseph Henry, to accompany the memorial volume heretofore ordered; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. BLAINE to add to the sixth section the following words:

And any military, naval, or civil officer, or any other person, who shall, except for the purposes herein named, appear armed with a deadly weapon of any description, either concealed or displayed, within a mile of any polling place where a general or special election for Representative to Congress is being held, shall, on conviction, be punished with a fine not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or with imprisonment for a period not less than six months nor more than five years, or with both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the question before the Senate the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, it is not my present purpose to discuss the questions presented in this bill to the extent and with the exhaustiveness I might desire, even were the principles involved less momentous or fraught with consequences less grave and far-reaching than they are.

I cannot but regard the question which has arisen from this first move of the democratic party upon their re-establishment in power looking to the grasping of the Government as absolutely the most important as well as the most vital question which has presented itself as a menace to our Government since the year 1861, when the same sentiment, as well as many of the same men, aimed a blow at the integrity of our country. Entertaining this view of the importance of the question, I believe it to be not alone the privilege but the bounden duty of every representative of the people to give it his serious attention and to lend his best efforts toward its wisest and most fortunate solution.

In acting upon this view of the case, it is my purpose to contribute the mite of whatever thought I may have given the question to the discussion; but at the same time, to present my views as succinctly as possible, that I may not deprive the country and myself of the statement of the opinions of others which may have a greater value to the general interest than the expressions of my own.

The question before this Congress has been most ably discussed by both parties in many of its aspects, and the eloquence and erudition of the leaders have thrown much light upon principles, as to which there has been great obscurity in the popular mind. The arguments have, however, chiefly run upon the propriety, the expediency, and the constitutionality of attaching legislative enactments to appropriation bills, and while having no disposition to recapitulate or resay what perhaps has been already better said upon this particular branch of the subject, I may be indulged in a few remarks upon it, rather as a preliminary to the line of argument upon which I propose its treatment.

The first thing, Mr. President, which would seem to strike an impartial observer is the determined purpose to accomplish by indirection an end which it is out of the power of its friends to accomplish fairly and according to the usual methods of legislation.

This is a bad introduction of any measure under a form of government like our own. If we lived under a monarch from whom we were compelled to wring by stratagem and force every concession to right and justice, we should seek some such way as that by which it has been attempted to compel legislation in a manner not contemplated by the letter and spirit of our Constitution.

But the people are the sovereigns of our country, and that measure which cannot go before them on its merits and abide the time and manner of their decision is weak, probably bad; and almost certainly in the interest of the few as against the interest of the many. Look for a moment, sir, at the history of this measure which proposes legislation of the most radical character. At no period of its history has the measure appeared in the form of independent legislation. Originally introduced into the last House when the Senate was republican in its majority, the evident purpose was to compel the Senate's acquiescence in a proposition which, as a measure appealing to their judgment and sense of right, they could not indorse. Now that the majority of the Senate has become democratic it is again before Congress with the expectation that the Senate in passing it will assist in influencing the last obstacle to its success, the presidential scrutiny. Plainly enough this course implies compulsion; unusual and unrecognized methods of accomplishment, as well as a fear to abide by the test of inherent merit, note the violent circumstances, so to speak, under which it was forced upon the last Congress—parliamentary rules providing that no legislation should be affixed to appropriation bills unless not only germane to the subject but likewise retrenching in character must be overridden, rendered useless and nugatory, in order to force this character of legislation upon the country. I have no desire to criticise the purposes of any legislator in the discharge of his functions, but I draw attention to this point as tending to show the determination to consummate this piece of proposed legislation against time, against argument, against the co-operative branches of the Government, and against the people, who it must be presumed are not to be trusted with the decision of this question.

Now, sir, I say the methods by which this legislation is attempted are bad upon their face, and argue in convincing terms against its propriety. The attempt has been made to show republican precedent, and to establish the justification of usage thereby. Recognized usage is the natural offspring of equity, and when it is violated usage must cease or bear the aspects of wrong. If the republicans as a party have perpetrated acts manifestly wrong, the precedent they establish does not justify a repetition of wrong by others, charged with duties of the most responsible character; and weighted with perplexities and embarrassments by those who were putting forth every effort to drag down the Government, it would be strange, indeed, if they could draw the country through the terrible ordeal which confronted it, preserve its integrity, and re-establish it upon its original basis of equality and justice without the commission of many mistakes. To do so would argue a perfection in human judgment scarcely to be hoped for, much less to be realized. But as a matter of fact, sir, there is no precedent for this manner of legislation in anything which the republican party has ever done.

Its import does not consist simply in tacking words which consummate or establish legislation upon a bill which of itself is not legislation in character. In one sense this may have been done, and while it is an objectionable method and should not be tolerated in the future, it does not compass the pernicious effect of the measure before us. What is that? What is that effect, sir? It lies wholly in the spirit of the method, and not so much in the method itself; when it has been done heretofore by the republicans, it was done not to force others to an act which in the ordinary mode they could prevent, but as conservative of time alone. If there be an instance on record by which it appears a President signed an appropriation bill containing items of extraneous legislation under protest, it was when the dominant party had a majority sufficiently great to pass it over his veto. Hence it cannot be said that the bill was duly enacted only through compulsion of one of the prescribed parties to it.

But, sir, there is no such state of case with this bill. Our Government is one of co-ordinate powers which have mutual duties, independent responsibilities, and separate checks one upon the other. If one branch of the Government takes away the freedom of action of the others, it usurps the powers, privileges, and functions of the whole. Now, sir, this constitutes coercion of the boldest, rankest kind. The measure being coercive is certainly against the spirit of the Constitution and, being so, is revolutionary to the last degree. The logic of this conclusion is so inevitable as to permit no outlet for escape. In the debate which has taken place on this bill, instances were adduced in sufficient number to show most convincingly how either House of Congress, by a refusal to perform its constitutionally prescribed duties, or by performing them in a manner not contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, might disrupt the Government as effectually as though accomplished by sword and gun, and the illustration might have been carried much further, which I will not take the time of the Senate in doing. The example, sir, of other governments, even if they corresponded in essential points of resemblance to our own, and those examples which have been heretofore cited by the supporters of this measure do not so correspond, would afford no salutary precedent for our own procedure. Why? Because the Constitution and genius of our governmental fabric are so entirely different as to furnish no precise points of correspondence from which to draw parallel illustrations. Being purely a Government of consentaneous powers in its legislative and executive features, the moment the free agency of one of the elements is interfered with that moment is violence done to the genius of the structure, and that moment is the ideal of republican government dissolved and hidden in the dark shadows of a government by force. The principle may live, sir, but the tangible essence will vanish. Now, sir, if legitimacy of principle of compelling one or two branches of the Government to yield to the other that free agency which constitutes one of the beauties and safeguards of the Republic be firmly established, then is it but a simple question of time and incident as to the precise period when the Government will go to pieces like a ship upon the rocks, and the American may exclaim with the Roman general, "Actum est de republica," "It is all over with the Republic."

This destruction will not come of necessity from the action contemplated in this bill; it will not this year, nor probably the next; but year by year encroachments will be made in this direction and in that direction; first one safeguard will be overturned and then another; to-day we shall have a statute repealed by indirect methods, and next year we may have the provisions of the Constitution itself subverted by the simple action of one branch of the National Government.

Let no gentlemen say this is an overdrawn picture or that it forms the wild vision of an alarmist. There is no safety, Mr. President, in the course which our democratic friends are pursuing in reference to this measure; no safety for the South, no safety for the North in their individual aspects, and no safety for them under the now proud ægis of their National Union. But, sir, our opponents say the President must approve this bill or the Government must go to pieces for want of supplies. With the knife at the throat of the executive department of the Government, the demand is, "Yield your constitutional prerogative or starve." Representatives, too, who prate from morning until night about the infraction of the Constitution, tyranny and force by the republican party! Sir, is it a new doctrine to these gentlemen that the Executive under the Constitution has the same right to a free exercise of judgment on the merits of a bill presented for his signature in signing or withholding his signature that they have in voting for or voting against a bill?

Let me here call attention on this point to the doctrine of the democracy in days gone by. I will read from the message of President Pierce of February 17, 1855. This message was sent to the Senate and House of Representatives vetoing the French spoliation bill, and in it the President used the following language speaking of the power vested in the Executive:

> He is not invested with power to defeat legislation by an absolute veto, but only to restrain it, and is charged with the duty, in case he disapproves a measure, of invoking a second, and a more deliberate and solemn consideration of it on the part of Congress. It is not incumbent on the President to sign a bill as a matter of course, and thus merely to authenticate the action of Congress, for he must exercise intelligent judgment, or be faithless to the trust reposed in him.
> While the Constitution thus confers on the legislative bodies the complete power of legislation in all cases, it proceeds, in the spirit of justice, to provide for the protection of the responsibility of the President. It does not compel him to affix the signature of approval to any bill unless it actually have his approbation; for, while it requires him to sign if he approve, it, in my judgment, imposes upon him the duty of withholding his signature if he do not approve.
> The President's responsibility is to the whole people of the United States; as that of a Senator is to the people of a particular State, that of a Representative to the people of a State or district; and it may be safely assumed that he will not resort to the clearly defined and limited power of arresting legislation, and calling for reconsideration of any measure, except in obedience to requirements of duty. When, however, he entertains a decisive and fixed conclusion, not merely of the unconstitutionality, but of the impropriety, or injustice in other respects of any measure, if he declares that he approves it he is false to his oath, and he deliberately disregards his constitutional obligations.

That, sir, was democratic doctrine in 1855. There the Executive claimed the right under the Constitution to exercise his judgment in signing or withholding his signature from a bill, the same as the legislative department of the Government exercise their right to vote for or against a bill. There was no thought then in the democracy, or at least no such idea was suggested by the democracy, that if the President vetoed a bill he thereby, as was said here yesterday, attempted to coerce the legislative department of the Government, so that they would have a right to withhold action afterward on the bill, even to the point of failing to appropriate money to carry on the Government. Substantially this language was uttered yesterday by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE.]

So, then, I say, taking the theory that has been held by the democratic party and the theory of all parties in reference to an act of coercion of one branch of the Government on another, this claim is entirely unprecedented. Hence I say, sir, in the most emphatic terms, that the form and manner of this proposed legislation is utterly repugnant to the pure and severely clean-cut requirements of a legal proposition; that in construction its design is suspicious and its meaning prevaricative; and in actual effect it is coercive, spoliative of the rights, functions, and duties of co-ordinate branches of the Government; it is against the spirit of our Constitution, deceptive, and revolutionary.

I sincerely regret, sir, as it seems to me every fair-minded man intent upon promoting justice and holding himself subject to conviction upon the great questions involving the welfare of his country must, that this attempted legislation was not put before us in a shape to challenge our sense of right and rest its fate entirely upon its own inherent merits. I should not give it my support, even in a separate bill; but it would then be without its coercive feature. Let me ask, Mr. President, in all candor and seriousness, why the legislation attempted in this appropriation bill was not put in that separate and well-defined shape?

From a partisan stand-point, sir, the answer will come quickly. As a partisan measure its friends have not the strength to enact it into a law duly and unexceptionably made. But, sir, such an answer prompts a further inquiry, which demands to know why, if it be a measure just in its purposes and conducive to the best interests of the greatest number, resort is had to a method which subjects its projectors to the charge of a fear of scrutiny and an indecent haste in its accomplishment? If it be a party measure, then are its friends justly open to all of the abuse they have charged upon republicans for subordinating the public interests to the behests of party. If it be a measure appealing to the sense of right and manifestly in the interest of the people, then why not make the appeal directly "unto Cæsar," a tribunal in our free country which soon or late rights all wrongs and condemns all evil? Why do not our democratic friends go directly to the people of this country in the election which is so near at hand, state their case fairly, and expect a certain verdict in their favor?

The logic of their present situation may be stated in these terms, sir: either they fear to submit their case to the tribunal of the people, and are thus grossly partisan in this measure, or they lack the moral courage of their convictions, which convictions should insure honesty, frankness, and equity instead of duplicity, double-dealing, and injustice.

For my own part, Mr. President, I do not propose to be deceived by the hidden designs of others, or to be misled by an error of judgment of my own. I know, sir, as every unbiased, unpartisan, and reflecting mind must know, the true signification and inevitable result of the measure now pushed upon the attention of this Chamber, plausible to the ear, not unpleasing to the eye; but with the curtain drawn, like a skeleton garnished with the sweet-smelling flowers of May, it is presented. It is my purpose to state my convictions upon this subject during the course of my remarks in a manner which I desire to be respectful but which I am determined shall not be misunderstood. With this in view I ignore every aspect of the question not directly connected with the inherent merits of the proposition. I shall hold my friends of the other side of this Chamber strictly to this treatment of the case. So far as my feeble power lies I will not permit them to evade or escape the issue in which the people I represent and the people of the country at large have the most vital interest.

Now, sir, let us get a clear idea of the ground upon which we stand, and with this purpose in view I ask the Secretary to read the section of the statute as it stands and the words that are to be taken away from it by the proposed amendment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace at the polls.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, sir, what is the obvious purport and intention of the section of the statute? Why, sir, to restrict, to prohibit and prevent every species of improper interference in elections by the civil, military, or naval powers of the General Government. In this respect the language of the section is as sweeping as the most exacting requirements could well demand. As a general mandate it is wholly conclusive. It is both declaratory and executive of the principle of absolute non-interference in elections. The most radical demand could ask for nothing more; and let me here remark, by way of parenthesis, that this section was prepared by a democratic Senator and fully concurred in and passed by a republican administration which had the power to reject it at once had they been at all opposed to the principle it represents.

Then, sir, in general terms it confessedly comports with every just idea of republican usage and safety. It declares a principle as to the correctness of which we are all in harmony. But the positive prohibition of the section is modified by the clear statement of two exceptions to its otherwise universal application. The first of these exceptions clearly implies the right of any military, naval, or civil officer, acting under proper authority of the United States, to order, bring, keep, or have under his authority armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State where it may be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States. There has been a time when there were armed enemies of the United States. That time has passed, thank God. But at this time, sir, when there are no "armed enemies" of the United States to be repelled, we are all in accord upon the propriety of this exception. What time may develop in the great march of human events, through which it may be deemed necessary by the opponents of the republican party to apply a gag by which the repeal of this exception may be forced, like a dose of bad medicine, down the throats of loyal men, I cannot say. We are dealing with the present, and, to a certain extent, we must let the future take care of itself. The second of these exceptions, sir, just as clearly implies the right of any military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, under authority of the United States, to order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, when it may be necessary to keep the peace at the polls. The time was, sir, when this exception received the votes of many of the party who are now clamoring for its repeal; the time may come when the other exception will be equally obnoxious to the party whose interests are so seriously hampered by the exception we are now considering.

The proposition now is, however, to strike from the section the last eight words covering the last of the two exceptions, so that it shall be shorn of the permission for any person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, either officer of the Army or Navy, United States marshal or his deputies, or any other person in the employ of the Government, to use troops, armed or unarmed, or citizens armed, at any election place for the purpose of keeping the peace at the polls.

Now, sir, let us analyze these words a little. What is the permission herein given? It is not even constructively to permit these persons named in the service of the United States to do anything but one at the polls where a general or special election is being held? Certainly not. What, then, is that one thing permitted them to do? Why simply to keep the peace. Have they a constructive or implied right to scrutinize ballots; to decide the question of who shall vote and who shall not; to coerce this voter and encourage that; to intimidate one class and assist another; manifestly not, sir; their simple prerogative is to keep the peace, by which is meant to prevent disorder, violence, and intimidation upon the part of others. Should they exceed this plain duty, they are amenable to all the penalties which such officers incur in the infraction of any rule or law for their government or guidance; their permission to act in exception of the general spirit and letter of the enactment is as rigid in construction as the law which awarded the greedy Shylock his pound of flesh, but terrified him by the injunction against taking one single drop of human blood. No other construction can be given to this law.

Now, sir, who objects to the maintenance of the peace at the polls? Is it the honest voter? Certainly not. Who then? Is it the dishonest man who would falsely vote? Can it be the ballot-box stuffer, the repeater, the white-leaguer, the rifle-clubs, the men who go gunning for negroes to prevent their voting? If not, who then?

Why, Mr. President, is it possible that in a country like this the power exists to suppress violence, mobs, and outrages at any place, at any time, except on the day of a national election at the polls where citizens are wont to exercise one of their most sacred constitutional rights?

These democrats say that they are in favor of peace and order, that they are opposed to violence, opposed to mobs, opposed to murder. When? On every day in the year except on the day of an election! That is the meaning of this amendment: keep the peace at all times, in all places, except on the day of election; and then no officer, civil, military, or naval, has a right to suppress a mob or protect the citizen in the exercise of his constitutional rights. That is what you mean, and that is what you propose.

Is it possible that the Representatives here who are clamoring for the repeal of this most wholesome provision are the persons having an interest for their constituents against keeping the peace at the polls? This must be so; their constituents must be the men who desire to break the peace, and further to break it in their own interest, as they would not be likely to break it in the interest of any one else. But the claim is made, sir, that the mere presence of civil or military power at a voting place is in itself intimidating to voters, and therefore destructive of the liberties of freemen.

This cannot be the case. Who was ever intimidated and prevented from doing an honest and proper act by an officer or other person merely standing by to protect him in doing that honest and proper act? No one, sir. Who is it, sir, on being abroad in our large cities in the night, that considers the policeman who stands on the street corners to keep the peace of the citizens to be a menace, a terror, an intimidation to the free citizen? Is it the honest man who wishes the law obeyed and enforced, or is it the murderer, the thief, the outlaw, who seeks to prey upon the lives and property of the peaceful, the innocent, and law-abiding part of the community? Sir, I say let the murderers and outlaws answer this question.

But, sir, to show how shallow is this pretext that this repeal is to prevent intimidation by the military, let me read a law now on the statute-books, passed June 18, 1878, only by the last Congress, prohibiting the use of the military even as a posse comitatus. You will find, approved June 18, 1878, the following section of a statute:

SEC. 15. From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States as a posse comitatus, or otherwise, for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by the Constitution or by act of Congress; and no money appropriated by this act shall be used to pay any of the expenses incurred in the employment of any troops in violation of this section; and any person willfully violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

We find that law standing upon the statute-book, and the Senator from Pennsylvania said yesterday that as far as the effect of this provision which they are now attempting to repeal is concerned, the law already enacted was sufficient to protect against any attempt on the part of any one to use the military as a posse at the polls. Therefore he argued that it was a mere pretext on our part that we were opposed to the repeal of the law now in question. This was the argument. Now, let me see what his argument proves. There is already a law protecting the people against the military being used as a posse comitatus. They have a law already passed last June protecting them against the military, and severe penalties imposed for the violation of the law. Why, then, if that be the case, do you attempt to repeal these eight words of this statute? What is the object? It only uncovers the design of this movement, and that is to strike at the civil authority, to prevent the United States Government being present at all in any capacity, either civil, military, or naval, at the polls on election day. That is all. It is to take away from the Government the right to be present, to show itself (whether its power be exercised or not) at the time you are electing a national officer who is to provide for the life and safety of the nation. That is the object of these gentlemen.

But, sir, their pretense is not real. To a man bent upon doing right, it does seem to me that the presence of persons armed in authority, either civil or military, would not be very dangerous; but it is not the military, it is the civil that these gentlemen desire to deprive of the right of being at the polls to preserve the peace and protect the rights of American citizens. The power of being present when I attempt to exercise a constitutional right, which is there for the purpose of protecting me in my right, to preserve the peace, to keep a murderer from shooting me down, to prevent the mob from capturing and carrying me off, depriving me of the right to vote—the idea that that course is intimidating to me who honestly desire to exercise my right, is absolutely farcical. Why, sir, honest men have no fear of the law which punishes dishonesty. Criminal laws have no terror for those avoiding criminal things, and never were truer words set to the jingle of poetry than those which declare—

> No rogue e'er felt the halter draw,
> With good opinion of the law.

Hence I affirm without fear of successful contradiction that the authority given by the section to the Government through its own officials to keep the peace at the polls is in the interest of order, fairness, and good government. But, sir, our democratic friends make violent objection to this provision upon another score, involving a principle upon which they believe theirs to be built. From that standpoint, they view with a horror bordering closely on insanity the attempt of the General Government to interfere even to keep the peace, within the bounds of a State. Well now, Mr. President, just within the narrow confines of this small claim lies the whole structure, with its animating principle of the democratic party. It is a thing designated in the infancy of that fossiliferous party as "State sovereignty" and through varying periods of its active life by varying names adopted to its varying claims, during the period of struggle between the slave-owners and the free State men for the control of the Territories, it was "squatter sovereignty," and in their later days the sovereign has disappeared and "home rule" usurps his place.

I shall have something more to say on this point before I finally conclude, and I pass on now to remark the utter perniciousness of this State-rights assumption as applicable to the point under discussion. I assume, sir, that this Government is either a nation per se, or it is a simple voluntary aggregation of States with a sovereign autonomy, each entirely competent to exercise its sovereignty by a withdrawal from the federation whenever its desires. It cannot have the aspect of both a sovereign nation and a collection of sovereign States. A paradox of insurmountable character is involved in the very idea of such a thing. But, however we may argue upon this matter, the strong arm of the American people, with gun and sword in hand, have settled the principle that the American Union is a nation sovereign and supreme. Then, sir, being a nation, I need scarcely remind the learned Senators upon this floor of the universally accepted maxim that a nation is justly entitled to every prerogative and function, not trenching upon the rights of other nations, which may be necessary to the preservation of its national character and its national integrity. To so large an extent is this an admitted principle, that the nations of Europe constantly go beyond their own limits and into the affairs and boundaries of other nations in order to preserve what they have called "the balance of power." In other words, so mindful are they of their own interests and the dangers besetting their national integrity that they wait for no "overt act" when a speck of threatening appears upon the horizon, but proceed at once to form such counter movements as shall render the rise of a power dangerous to the integrity of others as nearly out of the question as possible.

But descending from a nation to that of individuals, let me call to the minds of Senators a well-established and familiar principle of law; that is, that the conveyance of any right carries with it the reasonable means of enjoying that right. So the lease or purchase of premises carries with it the right to enjoy their occupancy. This is merely adduced to illustrate the principle that when a right is given or granted it carries with it the right of enjoyment of the same. Sir, wherever a right is granted or guaranteed by the Constitution the Government must have the power to enforce it and protect the citizen in the exercise of it.

So the fugitive-slave law was enforced by the use of both military and civil authority in States where slavery did not exist, upon the democratic doctrine then that it was a right recognized by the Constitution and therefore must be enforced by the power of the Government.

But to return, sir; if a nation possesses these indisputable rights to preserve its own integrity just touched upon, including the right to go outside of its own limits and interfere with the affairs of neighboring and even remote nations, will it be claimed that a Government like our own, whose life is vested in representation from its many constituent parts, is powerless to protect itself from the irruption of enemies perhaps, or at the least from persons who may have done violence to a fair election for a national Legislature, and in representing a minority of the people destroy the essential idea of our institutions, the idea which declares that a majority shall rule? So plain and unavoidable is this principle, sir, that refuge is taken behind the clause of the Constitution which makes each House the judge of the qualifications of its own members. In the face of partisan majorities and the latter-day methods of conducting elections in the South we know the scope of this provision too well to regard it in any serious light as a protection against fraud or a guarantee of a fair representation of a majority of the people. But let us carry the principle further than the elections for members of the National House of Representatives. Let us consider for a moment what may be termed the local officers of a State and their relations to the General Government, without any wish on my part for the Government to interfere in purely local matters.

From the governor to the most unimportant officer bearings are had in some channel upon the interests of the nation at large and upon the interests of sister States. It is not necessary that I should trace them here, Mr. President, but I may be permitted to call attention to the important interests the country has in a fair election of members of a State legislative body which possesses the function of choosing a person to represent the State in this body. I need only to suggest the idea of its importance to the gentlemen whom I am addressing; the principle has no need of elaboration. Is it not plain, then, that the Government as a government possesses the power whenever the necessity arises to suppress violence within the limits of any State when it is manifestly necessary to insure its own preservation; or shall it be concluded that a great nation is entirely at the mercy of the caprice or wickedness of a mere handful of its own citizens and that it must sit passively down and witness the efforts which must topple it over to the ground? Now, sir, we have all learned to regard consistency as a jewel, for it implies conviction in certain ideas and honesty in seeking to disseminate them. Have our democratic friends been consistent in their extreme demands concerning the rights of States? I wish, sir, I could say they had been. But the fugitive-slave act before alluded to, with the revolting proceedings under it, stands as a living testimonial against their justice and against the consistency of their professions. Ah, sir, for the poor hound-hunted fugitive seeking escape from his bondage our hearts must ever bleed; but we may, in view of the happy issue of his sufferings, whereby he has been brought from slavery to the full estate of man, forget those sufferings or remember them only as a sad means to a happy end. But in the party who have so tenaciously held to a principle which they persistently violate whenever their own party designs are involved, we can have no abiding confidence as to its safety or its justice. It is not so many years ago, sir, but that we can all remember now the circumstances of the proclamation of President Fillmore for the capture of a poor fugitive slave. I ask the Secretary to read that proclamation of February 18, 1851, from the book which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A proclamation by the President of the United States.

Whereas information has been received that sundry lawless persons, principally persons of color, combined and confederated together for the purpose of opposing by force the execution of the laws of the United States, did, at Boston, in Massachusetts, on the 15th of this month, make a violent assault on the marshal or deputy marshals of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, in the courthouse, and did overcome the said officers, and did, by force, rescue from their custody a person arrested as a fugitive slave, and then and there a prisoner lawfully holden by the said marshal or deputy marshals of the United States, and other scandalous outrages did commit, in violation of law:

Now, therefore, to the end that the authority of the laws may be maintained, and those concerned in violating them brought to immediate and condign punishment, I have issued this my proclamation, calling on all well-disposed citizens to rally to the support of the laws of their country, and requiring and commanding all officers, civil and military, and all other persons, civil or military, who shall be found within the vicinity of this outrage, to be aiding and assisting, by all means in their power, in quelling this and other such combinations, and assisting the marshal and his deputies in recapturing the above-mentioned prisoner; and I do especially direct that prosecutions be commenced against all persons who shall have made themselves aiders or abettors in or to this flagitious offense; and I do further command that the district attorney of the United States, and all other persons concerned in the administration or execution of the laws of the United States, cause the foregoing offenders, and all such as aided, abetted, or assisted them, or shall be found to have harbored or concealed such fugitive contrary to law, to be immediately arrested and proceeded with according to law.

Given under my hand and the seal of the United States this 18th day of February, 1851.

[L. S.]

MILLARD FILLMORE.
DANIEL WEBSTER,
Secretary of State.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I have had that read for the purpose of showing that during the administration of Mr. Fillmore the authority was exercised by the President of the United States, without being called on by governor or State Legislature, of using the military, the civil, and the naval power of the Government for the purpose of pursuing and capturing a fugitive slave in a State where slavery did not exist. So we all remember, too, the arrest of a poor fugitive slave from Virginia named Burns, who also escaped to Boston, and the event was regarded of such importance that President Pierce ordered the use of the Army, the Navy, and the civil authorities to secure his return to Virginia. President Pierce, in May, 1854, did not only deem that he had the authority to use the military and naval power of the Government in protecting the peace of the citizens, as it was called, but in arresting, capturing, and returning a fugitive slave. He issued an order which was sent to the military officer commanding in New York; he issued his orders to those in command of the marines in Boston; he issued his orders to the marshal and all civil authorities, and instructed and called upon them to arrest, capture, and return a fugitive slave from his protectors.

Why, sir, when we go back and reflect on this, I only beg my fellow-Senators to contemplate this act for a moment: a tired, bleeding human being, escaped from bondage, hunted with the keen-fanged bloodhound until he found his way to a community of fellow-creatures who had all the heart and all the humanity to give him comfort and protection, is violently seized within the limits of another State, and by the naval forces of the United States, through order of the President, is torn from his protectors and returned to his bondage in the State of Virginia. At that moment what became of the much-vaunted sacredness of State lines and authority by this use of the military and naval power in the execution of civil process, not in putting down mobs or protecting persons against violence? What became of the principle of the nation having no right to interfere with State affairs? How was it that troops could enter a State without a call by the governor or Legislature being made on the President under the fourth article of the Constitution? Upon what theory? Upon the theory that that right was recognized in the Constitution, and hence the right should be enforced and protected by all the power of the General Government. This was your theory and doctrine when you wished to enslave a human being.

So, too, with the rights guaranteed to a man as a citizen of the United States. The right to vote being recognized, he has the right to the free exercise of all the privileges guaranteed in the Constitution of the United States, and shall we not say that in national elections the citizen shall be protected against mobs, against murder, against violence, and shall be permitted to cast his ballot peaceably and quietly for representatives in the National Government. It rests on the same principle and it has more authority under the Constitution than the recognition of slavery had.

But, sir, is it not strange that dogs must be called, navies must unfurl their sheets to the breeze, the deep thunder tones of artillery must be heard on the flank of a poor bleeding wretch in order to capture him and put him in bondage; but when the poor wretch stands up before his brothers as a man with rights under the Constitution given to him, and the right to vote at an election, and he says to that same Government, "You once pursued me and returned me to a master, and now you have given me rights as a citizen; now I am made free as you are; you promised me protection; I now appeal to you for it;" I ask in the name of conscience, in the name of justice, in the presence of humanity, what there is in that principle that will follow and starve and persecute a man in slavery that will not protect him when he is a freeman? I ask some one to tell me where the principle is of justice, of right, of humanity that will permit us, when this man asks us now to protect him in casting his ballot, to say to him, "No; we hunted you when you were a slave; we will stand by and see you murdered now and shot down in cold blood; we have clothed you with the rights of an American citizen, and we feel that we have no power to protect you." My God, what a government that is!

But, sir, let us glance for a moment at the effects of amending the section by striking out the words as proposed. To take away the second exception authorizing the civil, military, and other officers of the Government to keep the peace at the polls would result in depriving the Government of those self-protecting means which I think I have fairly shown every nation is fully justified in using. But under the sweeping terms of the amended law, no mob violence at the polls, no outrageous intimidation of law-abiding citizens by armed ruffians could be interfered with by an officer under commission of the Government, whose life perhaps was tremblingly awaiting the issue. No United States marshal and no other civil officer could lawfully interpose his official authority against the wildest violence and fraud which might sway an unscrupulous mob. "Oh," say our democratic friends, "leave that all to the State authorities, they will provide against all that." But, sir, have they done it? If they have, do they enforce the law? But, sir, I hold that the matter affecting the national interest should be provided for by the national authorities, and that trusts so important should not be permitted for a moment to rest solely with the States. But in addition to this consideration there is the already demonstrated fact that the State authorities, sometimes being in the same interest as the men who commit the violence, will interpose no means to prevent it or to bring the culprits afterward to justice. Where, then, is protection to come from if not from the Government? If that be true, then I ask you to tell me where is the protection? Where will it come from? If the States fail to do it, if the State Legislatures fail to provide, if the State courts fail to decide in his favor, where then must the protection come from and where must the citizen turn his eyes to seek it if not to the General Government?

Now, Mr. President, if this statement were denied by our democratic friends, in order to prove the truthfulness we should be compelled to recite all the terrible crimes which have been perpetrated against the elective franchise in the Southern States of our country. I do not propose doing that, sir, at this time. But I have some very significant figures to adduce, and some questions to ask which may trouble our democratic friends to answer satisfactorily.

I wish to premise the showing of figures which I propose making by the open statement that the southern white people, as a mass, have never to this moment accepted the decisions of the war. They have never accepted the principles of a fair and tolerant election, even among the whites themselves, while as to the colored man the amendments to the Constitution securing him citizenship, with equal rights before the law, are silently regarded as things to be necessarily tolerated, but only to the time when the southern democracy shall "capture the Capitol" and laugh the "nigger amendments," as they call them, to scorn. I say, sir, with all the earnestness of a man speaking in sorrow and not in anger, that, practically, freedom of elections in many of the Southern States of America is a dead letter this very day, and, so far as the amendment now under consideration may have application to those, it is a matter of no concern whatever with the democracy whether it be passed or not. This statement may surprise some of my friends, sir, but I propose showing ere long what the real purpose of this amendment is.

But I reiterate the assertion that there is not such a thing as fair elections in the majority of the Southern States; that if there were any such elections a number of those States would be largely republican in majority, and that in consequence both branches of the present Congress would have a large republican majority. These facts are indisputable. The colored man has been cheated of his citizenship, robbed of his franchise, and the republican party, through its magnanimity to a people who have shown by their acts how little they deserve it, have been shorn of the power to continue peacefully their work of reconstruction upon the ideal hope of the Republic. I speak strongly, sir, but my words are susceptible of "confirmation strong as proof of Holy Writ."

Startling as the information may be to the northern people, it is nevertheless true, sir, that this country is to-day governed by the South. Let us realize the full force of the fact. According to a volume recently published by Mr. A. R. Spofford, the Librarian of Congress, sixteen Southern States had a total white and colored population in 1870 of 13,628,205 souls, while the then twenty-one Northern States had a population of 24,487,436 souls, being almost double that of the Southern States. According to the same authority, sixteen Southern States showed an aggregate of internal-revenue receipts for the year last past of $26,338,413, while twenty-one Northern States for the same year showed an aggregate of receipts from the same sources of $78,378,907, or more than three times the amount from the Southern States. The footings of these amounts have been hastily made by myself, and while they may not be accurate to a unit, they do not vary far from exactness, the one State admitted since not included.

But let us look a little further, sir. I find that the present Congress contains one hundred and ninety-two democratic members, and of this number one hundred and twenty-nine are from the South and only sixty-three from the North, being more than double the number of members from the South than from the North. Very well, sir. Now, I need not call to the minds of the Senators present the fact which I desire the people of the North to be fully acquainted with, which is that the democratic members of the Forty-sixth Congress, are governed in all items of essential legislation by a majority vote of the democratic caucus.

Now, the Southern States having one hundred and twenty-nine members in that caucus and the Northern States having sixty-three members in the caucus, is it not easy to see that all democratic legislation is made in the interests of the Southern States, and that a section of country which in 1870 had a population of less than fourteen millions, whose revenue receipts were less than $27,000,000, or about $2 per capita on the basis of the census of 1870, rules completely, absolutely rules, sir, a section of country with a population of nearly twenty-five millions and whose revenue receipts were nearly $79,000,000, or over $3 per capita.

Now, Mr. President, this unvarnished statement appears sufficiently alarming, but it is my stern duty to carry the conclusion to its utmost limit. I ask my friends to go down the list of these one hundred and twenty-nine southern democratic members of the Forty-sixth Congress and note the number who only fifteen years ago were arrayed with the hosts of rebellion and endeavoring to destroy by every means in their power a Government which has done the most unparalleled act on record in the history of nations, that of subduing the men who attempted its destruction, wresting their swords from their hands, and then almost with tears in their eyes inviting them back to make laws for their conquerors. With these facts before our eyes, sir, am I not justified in the declaration that the men who in the sight of God had their hands at the throat of their country have their feet at this moment upon the necks of those who gave up their relatives, spent their own blood, and poured out their own treasure in its defense. I stand here, sir, as the representative of a State and of a section of our country which stood gallantly among the foremost in the great work of preserving our imperiled country, and I will speak the truth fearlessly though the very heavens fall.

But, Mr. President, I have made the statement that there is absolutely no such thing in the majority of the Southern States proper as a fair and impartial election. As a proof of this it is not my purpose, as I said before, to go into those details of individual outrages which are unfortunately too well attested; but I wish to present some facts and figures which to the thoughtful mind will speak far more elo-quently than words, and which will serve to show the military terrorism by the United States authorities of which our southern democratic friends complain. Not only shall we learn this from a review of the figures but we shall also behold how certainly those people have nullified the citizenship of the colored man and rendered the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution the merest farces which have ever been enacted.

In the year 1868 General Grant received a total of 214 electoral votes for President of the United States. Of these 214 votes 9 were from North Carolina, 10 from Tennessee, 8 from Alabama, 5 from Arkansas, and 3 from Florida, making a total of 40 electoral votes from the seceding States. At the election of 1872 General Grant received 286 votes for President, 11 of which were from Virginia, 10 from North Carolina, 9 from South Carolina, 8 from Mississippi, 10 from Alabama, and 4 from Florida, being a total of 50 electoral votes from the seceding States. Now mark the contrast, sir. In 1876 the republican candidate for President, General Hayes, only received from the States just enumerated 4 votes from Florida and 7 votes from South Carolina. What became of the majorities which cast the votes of those States for General Grant, when there was no claim made of illegal voting and intimidation at that time? What became of the votes of the colored men in Mississippi and South Carolina who largely outnumbered the whites, according to the census of 1870, and who were almost to a man republican in politics? I ask any candid man to weigh these incontrovertible facts and then decide as to whether they have fair elections in the South.

But still further, sir, it is a matter of statistics, accessible to any inquirer, that whole districts of the Southern States are preponderatingly composed of colored men. Nay, in many districts the colored people outnumber the white as two or three to one. These colored people understand full well that it was the republican party that brought them out of slavery, and unrestrained and untrammeled in their right of suffrage they are solidly republican. Now, sir, where are the representatives in Congress of these immense republican majorities? Mr. BRUCE, the respected Senator from Mississippi, stands alone upon this floor as the last representative of four million people who through trials and bloodshed were brought to a view of the promised land only to be sunk into the depths of renewed despair. I ask these southern gentlemen to whom has been committed a sacred trust a question which has been asked with fearful import once before in the history of the human race, "Cain, what hast thou done with thy brother?" But three republican districts of the South and but four republicans sit in both branches of Congress beside one hundred and twenty-nine democrats to light up the tableau representing a "solid South." Now, Mr. President, I know very well the answer which will be made to these inquiries so plainly put. When I ask these democratic gentlemen where the representatives of colored constituencies are they immediately retort by asking why the republicans of the North send no colored representatives to the Halls of Congress? Such a reply is not worthy of serious men and ignores the fact, explain it as we will, that the human race follows the promptings of consanguinity; and all experience shows that classes are formed in all communities, and thus the Irish community is pretty certain to be represented by one of their own blood, the German community by a German, an American community almost as certain by an American, and the colored community would be just as certain to be represented by a colored man; but it is characteristic of the great republican party that they give all classes of their constituency a fair representation in the administration of the public affairs of our country.

Now, sir, when they ask me why we do not send colored men to Congress from the North, or when they say the colored men as a class vote the democratic ticket and that is the reason why their majorities are so large, it seems very amusing. I will ask the question of my democratic friends, did any person ever see a colored democrat holding office? He would be a rara avis indeed.

Upon a basis of numbers, sir, and of well-known facts concerning the political sentiments of the colored people, we should see here today in the Forty-sixth Congress unbroken republican delegations from the States of South Carolina and Mississippi, and a preponderating republican vote from the States of Alabama, Louisiana, and Florida. Reasoning from all established laws pertaining to political majorities, coupled with well-ascertained data which speak more eloquently than even statistics and figures, the political complexion of the congressional representatives from the seceding States should be changed so as to show twenty more republican members than now appears, and a corresponding less number of democratic members. The details of these changes might be enumerated almost to a certainty. This would give the republicans 148 votes in the House, omitting any calculation as to California, which is yet to vote, and therefore that party would have a majority in the House, which there can be no earthly doubt it is fairly and legitimately entitled to.

By a process of reasoning as nearly approaching certainty as anything can well be not absolutely demonstrated, the States of South Carolina, Florida, Mississippi, and Louisiana are entitled to six additional republicans on the floor of the Senate. These would be constituted of two Senators from each of those States, with the exception of Louisiana and Mississippi, which already have one republican each. This change in the political personnel of the Senate would give the republicans a majority in this body. Now, Mr. President, there can be no man who having knowledge of the true situation of affairs in the South but will say that upon a free election throughout the South, an election conducted without the democratic adjuncts of "rifle clubs," "red shirts," "white-leaguers," kuklux, et id genus omne, the results in favor of the republicans would be in excess of what I have just stated them.

But let us look a little further, sir, in order that we may be enabled to form a better idea of what is meant by a "free ballot" in the Southern States. In the year 1876 Governor Chamberlain, of South Carolina, received as the republican candidate for governor of that State a fair and honest majority over General Hampton, democratic candidate, of 3,433 votes. Fairly elected, as we all know, he nevertheless did not receive the office. But now mark, sir, at the last election in that State Governor Hampton, the democratic candidate for governor, is represented as having received a total of 119,550 votes. At this election there were recorded how many republican votes? Not one. How many in opposition? Two hundred and thirteen are marked on the list as "scattering" in opposition to Governor Hampton. Two hundred and thirteen votes, Mr. President, to represent the total strength of the republicans in a State where, if they have a single solitary vote at all, they have a fair majority over all voters. But now, sir, consider still another fact. This result occurred at the State election, where the United States laws were not enforced in 1878. Sir, at the presidential election in 1876, which was conducted under the provisions of this section and others relating to elections our democratic friends are so anxious to repeal because of the oppressiveness and terrorism, General Hayes, the republican candidate for President, received a total of 91,786 votes, and Governor Tilden, the democratic candidate, received 90,896. These figures show conclusively that, at the gubernatorial election since, the republicans under the free ballot system of the South were cheated out of over 90,000 votes. The Legislature of that State is composed of one hundred and fifty democrats and only eight republicans. This was done by the same sort of fraud which elected the democratic governor and which has cheated the republicans of their just representation upon this floor. From the State of Georgia, which at the last presidential election gave General Hayes 50,446 votes, not a single member of Congress is returned, and there are but four republicans in the State Legislature. In Arkansas, where General Hayes received 38,699 votes out of a total vote of 83,730, the republicans have but seven members in the Legislature and not a single representation on the floor of Congress.

In Alabama General Hayes received for President, in the year 1876, 66,230 votes, but at the gubernatorial election of two years later not a single republican vote was cast. In two short years 66,230 republican voters had their voices stifled or had been removed, let us hope, to a better land through the courteous assistance of the rifle-clubs. In 1868 this State gave General Grant 5,000 and in 1872 15,000 majority.

In Mississippi General Grant received 82,175 votes; Greeley, 47,288—a majority of 35,000 votes in 1872 in favor of the republicans. Four years later this immense vote had shrunk to 52,605, which was given for General Hayes. But now let us note a curious circumstance in this connection. The State also gave for Tilden, the democratic candidate, 112,173 votes, returning his majority as 49,568 votes. The total vote of the State in 1876 was 164,778, being a total increase in four years of 35,315. This, upon the basis of five persons to each voter, would represent an increase of the population of Mississippi in the short period named of 176,575 souls, and this, too, in a State which is known to have decreased in population. At the gubernatorial election of 1877 Governor Stone received a total of 96,382 votes, while the republican vote, under the head of "scattering," was recorded as 1,168, a shrinkage, in one year from the presidential election, of over 50,000 votes. This result may be claimed by our democratic friends, however, as a testimonial of recognition of the eminent services rendered by Governor Stone in the arrangement of the Kemper County unpleasantness, as well as an expression of the indignation of our democratic friends over the Chisholm massacre.

In the State of Louisiana the census of 1870 shows a preponderance of colored people over the whites of more than 2,000. The registration of voters in this State under the reconstruction acts showed 83,065 colored voters and 44,670 white voters. The "fusion" registration of 1872 showed the colored vote to be 90,047 and the white vote 88,179. The registration of 1876 gave the colored vote as 115,268 and the white vote as 88,179. Now, sir, under this plain preponderance of the colored vote over the white in Louisiana, not one colored man represents that State upon the floors of Congress, and but one white republican to represent a republican constituency, and, sir, by the democratic count General Hayes received for President in 1876 77,154, which was reduced by the electoral commission to 75,135.

I will not multiply these citations, Mr. President, though I could do so to a much greater extent. What is the plain lesson to be drawn from them? Why, manifestly this: upon every occasion where the republican voters of the South received protection from the national authorities, under this and other sections of law which it is now sought to repeal, the republican vote in all instances was large, and in the case of several of the Southern States it is sufficiently large to give the elections to the republican party; but when the United States authority, the marshals and deputies, disappear from the scene and the private military of the negro-hating democracy of the South appear upon it, then the republican vote vanishes into thin air.

This is the plain moral of the case, Mr. President, which cannot be gainsaid or controverted; and in the face of this sad state of a country boasting a freedom and a civilization in advance of any other nation on the face of the earth, it is deliberately sought to pull down the last prop under the toppling temple of our free elections, and to try to prove to the world, what has so often been asserted, that a government of the people is a snare and an impossibility. Can we permit this to be done? I do not know, sir, that any words of mine will prevent the passage of this iniquitous measure; but I am determined, sir, that the country shall know that they are surrendering this Government into the hands of men whom, many of them, have met upon the battle-field in the first effort of the southern democracy to rend in twain the American Republic and build upon its ruins a southern empire.

Now, sir, the bold and arrant pretext for this repealing legislation is the professed desire for fair elections, especially in the South—the necessity for removing the intimidation and terrorism of United States officials at election places! Why, sir, the facts I have cited prove the most perfectly organized system of espionage, compulsion, and terrorism which has ever been known exists in many parts of the South to-day. In those States the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution are practically abrogated now. We all know our democratic friends claim that the colored man is now voting the democratic ticket in the South without compulsion. Is any man so weak as to believe a story like this? Can we believe the negro to have so little intelligence as not to know, or knowing, to have forgotten the authors of his freedom? No, sir; these poor oppressed people have sighed for their deliverers to complete the work of redemption by the only means which can secure it to them—the strong arm of power. But we have listened to the misrepresentations of men who have deceived us once, have shown their readiness to do it again, and in our magnanimous desire for peace and to raise up a vanquished foe, we have quietly permitted the greatest of wrongs to be inflicted upon the colored people as well as the people of the whole country.

I honor the motive that prompted the conciliatory course which has been pursued toward the South; but I must be permitted, sir, to express the fear that we have taken a serpent to our bosoms which, as it becomes warmed by the generous fires of sympathy, will sting us to death. But, sir, a revelation is now forcing itself upon our minds. The manumitted slave of the South, who after having tasted the free estate of man and hoping for its full fruition at the hands of northern republicans, has now taken his destiny into his own keeping and has inaugurated a movement in his own behalf the full consequence of which no man can foretell. Failing in the hope of justice from those who hunt him down with shot-gun and rifle, he has packed his little bundle of earthly possessions, bidden adieu to the sunny climes of the South, and started for a home among those who will recognize and protect his manhood.

Let me tell my democratic friends that they have overreached themselves, and the time will certainly come when they will sigh to make the "rejected stone the head of the corner." No people know better than they the absolute necessity of the negro labor in the fields of the South. Let them not hope that the movement is to be local or temporary; that the negro, cold and hungry, will be left to die in a climate unnatural to him. No, sir; Providence seems to have taken up the cause where the republican party dropped it. A new solution of the question has presented itself, and henceforth the sympathizing people of the North will raise funds for colonization purposes as freely as they subscribed to send Sharp's rifles, and men to use them, into imperiled Kansas, or to help the South during the yellow-fever scourge. The exodus of colored people from the South will continue until the authors of all their wrong and crime will sadly moralize over deserted cities and uncultivated fields, and mourn the stupidity and selfishness of those who projected their ruin upon them.

But, sir, I have said that, so far as the South is concerned, the democracy do not care a rush whether we pass this amendment or not. The South is solid, and "peace reigns in Warsaw." The object of the repeal lies in another direction, for the democratic leaders, North and South, have made up their minds that unless these wholesome laws can be repealed they can never hope for a President. That is the object of this move, sir. Repeal this law and the others that will follow, and then the disgraceful frauds perpetrated by the roughs of all our large cities in the olden time, when they but had to know the majority to be overcome in order to furnish the necessary vote, will be repeated. The city of New York will poll enough votes to drown any majority the State at large may give. So of Philadelphia as regards Pennsylvania, of Cincinnati as regards Ohio, of Chicago as regards Illinois, and so of all the rest. Can our people not see the insidious but certain steps by which this Government is being handed over to democratic rule, and thereby southern domination?

Now, sir, there are those who assume a belief that the democratic party will never demand payment of the southern claims; that they do not oppress and kill the colored man who votes the republican ticket, and that a change of party would be a salutary thing. Let us waive objection to all these for the argument, and still I say that the salvation of this Government, the hope of the poor man and the security of the rich one, all are bound up in the defeat of the democracy. Stripping the whole subject of all the details we have just been considering, I say there is one radical issue between the parties which involves the perpetuation or discontinuance of our present form of government, as the one or the other party may succeed. This issue extends beyond the confines of a voting poll, and loses sight of rifle clubs and white-leaguers. It is the distinctive difference in the theory and philosophy of government entertained by two peoples who by education are almost as distinct as their principles. The democracy represent the narrow and antiquated idea of State sovereignty, a theory which once admitted would carry certain disintegration to this Union of States whenever caprice might desire or accident precipitate it. The human race may have begun existent upon this theory—small bands following their chief sovereign in themselves—but the progress of the world has called for the building of nations, and unquestionably the most advanced and exalted ideas of human government yet achieved by man are represented by the principles of the republican party, a party, sir, which rescued this nation from the destructive results of democratic theory and practice, and which has placed it in all that challenges the admiration of men high above any other government yet contrived by human wisdom.

The passage of this amendment, sir, would be an act of inexpediency for the democratic party. It would carry the conviction to the minds of those who still may doubt it that the party as a party is not a party of law, of order, of right or of justice. It would confirm the charges of disloyalty which are made against the party, as the intent of the amendment to cheat the honest and law-abiding voter out of his franchise is too apparent to be hidden from any but the most obtuse. The amendment, sir, is wrong; and just as surely as the democratic party perpetrate the folly of forcing its passage just so surely must the tide of popular sentiment rise against and overwhelm them in its flood of indignation.

I solemnly warn my democratic friends against the violent policy they are pursuing. They are sowing to the wind; let them beware of the harvest! Let them not again mistake the temper of the loyal people of this country. Open, generous, magnanimous they have proven themselves, as the southern democracy have good cause to know and feel. But I stand here to-day to warn the men who having once attempted the destruction of the government and are tampering with it again, that they must not go too far. Loyal men have not forgotten their brothers who found untimely graves at the hands of treason. They have not forgotten their own wounds, privations, and sufferings. They have not forgotten the price paid for the blessings of freedom they enjoy. They are slow to move, slow to believe that which they do not wish to believe. But if this democratic party of oppression and aggrandizement again forces the issue on this country and compels the people once more to rise in their might and rescue their free institutions from the torch which threatens their destruction, there will be no half-way work about it. The spirit of kindness heretofore actuating our people toward men who insist upon showing they do not deserve it, is fast changing into another feeling. Sir, I tell these men, in the plainest language, that they are going too far. They are tampering with the patience and forbearance of a people who are beginning to feel that patience and forbearance are fast ceasing to be virtues. Let democrats of the South and their northern allies beware the storm they are raising. The spirit of retaliation once raised, sir, will only be appeased by the most radical assurances of future quiet. If the disease upon our body-politic again requires the knife, they may rest assured the surgeon will "cut beyond the wound to make the cure complete."

Sir, in common with thousands of others, I had sincerely hoped and expected that the democracy of both South and North would have rightly interpreted the general desire of the country for peace and good-fellowship between all sections. I have been mistaken, sir. The spirit of extreme conciliation manifested toward the South has not been met with a similar spirit, but has developed an aggressiveness which is filling the people with alarm and apprehension. Duty demands that we should speak plainly as to the crisis before us.

I make the open charge that the democratic party is tampering with the gravest interests of a people who are vigilantly awake to designs against the well-being of the Government.

I charge the democratic party with professing a desire for peace and harmony while making bold innovations upon all the principles established at the cost of the nation's blood and treasure.

I charge that party with an insincere prating about the duty of protecting and preserving our Constitution, while they, having been the only ones to attempt its destruction, now furnish no substantial guarantee against a similar and perhaps more successful attempt, as opportunity offers, though in a different manner.

I make the charge that they eulogize the arch-traitor Davis as a patriot in the presence of the representatives of that Government which he did his utmost to destroy.

I charge an unjust vilification of the republican party because of the entailment of a debt upon the country created because of the treasonable acts of the democratic party. I charge them with selfishly arrogating the Government, as having been left to them as a heritage by their fathers, and ignoring the men who saved it from their assaults.

Now, Mr. President, I arraign the democratic party as the party responsible to-day for whatever discord there may exist. The republican party want peace; they have shown it by every concession which honor and dignity would permit; they will still sacrifice much to obtain a permanent peace; but the democracy may as well learn now as later that there are some things the republicans will not do to reach a peace which can but be dishonorable to them and to the country. They will not abjectly beg upon their knees for peace. They will not relinquish any of those advanced principles which have inured to the Government and the people through the sufferings of the war. They will never abandon the principles enunciated in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution. They will never permit a modification of the rights of the four million blacks of the South. They, after having been liberated from slavery and elevated to the full rights of citizenship, shall not be remanded to a condition as bad or worse than serfdom or peonage. They will never, never quietly permit, sir, the elective franchise, upon the purity of which rests our whole political structure, to be dispensed at the hands of hired ruffians and paid assassins.

Now, sir, let me invite the democracy to a peace which shall be co-extensive with the whole limits of our country; which shall be honorable to them and honorable to us; which shall be lasting as the American name; which shall elevate us in the estimation of all the nations, and stamp our Government as a model for all other peoples for a thousand centuries—a peace which must be built upon genuine ties of respect between citizens of a common country; which must rest upon the concession of equal rights to all citizens of the Republic, be they white or black, foreign or native born—a peace which must know no State lines for abrogating the rights of citizens, but shall cluster around the American flag as the emblem of a patriotic and virtuous people united under a government strong enough to defy the monarchs of the world and also protect its citizens in all their constitutional rights, on land and on sea, at home and abroad, leaving the great future of our glorious country clean, clear, and full in the blazing sunlight of our hope.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the last few sentences of the speech of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN,] so variant, from all the balance of his speech, are simply a synopsis of the policy of the democratic party, if I heard them correctly. We propose to have free elections; we propose to secure equal rights to all men, and local self-government for States and people, free from any interference by the United States military authorities or any other extraneous source. All the indictments that we have heard threatened by the Senator, and all the arraignments that have been hurled against us in the last two days by the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] seem to me to be very unnecessary and ill-timed when we are discussing only a plain, simple proposition, which is: Have the representatives of the people of the United States in Congress assembled the right peaceably and in an orderly way to pass a law saying that the State authorities shall have the right to conduct their own elections uncontrolled by United States military interference? Shall they have the right to have honest juries in their jury-boxes untrammeled by test oaths? Is there enough virtue in the State governments to manage their own affairs and conduct their own State, local, and congressional elections without the intervention of Federal bayonets controlled by so-called United States marshals, supervisors, or any other outside power of that sort?

When that proposition is submitted by the democratic party we are met with threats, charges, indictments, arraignments, and denunciations such as are rarely heard even on the hustings, far less in the Senate of the United States. I can readily understand, however, why the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Illinois are hurling their anathemas against the men of the South and against the democratic party. It is because the scepter is departing from Judah. They have no longer a united South as they had ten years ago. When all the banks, the bondholders, the protected monopolists, and the other robbers of the Treasury had full sway, when subsidies were being squandered far and wide, a united South, a united radical South, was at their back indorsing all they did. There was not a word uttered against a united South then. I hold in my hand the record showing that from all the South, when they had no intelligent constituency, none but negro voters outside of the carpet-baggers and Freedman's Bureau agents, every Senator from the eleven States who was here was an emissary of their own sent there by Congress and elected by Congress to Congress to come here and sit and vote subject to the order of their masters. Yet with none but a negro constituency they never had but one solitary colored man, Mr. Revels, of Mississippi, in the Senate Chamber. All the others were northern emissaries sent to the South to obey and enforce radical congressional dictation. The Senator from Illinois rises now and complains because there is but one representative of that race in the Senate, and says that we are trampling on the rights of the colored men and disregarding every claim which they have upon the people. We are as liberal as you were, and treat the colored race better than you ever did, without making any pretense of being their special champions. I repel all accusations so freely hurled against southern Senators and Representatives, as they are too manly to speak of themselves. I put it to the American people whether the representatives who are here now from the South ought to be spoken of or referred to on the same day with the miscreants whom the republican party kept in power from there while they had control of those States. No decent man, white or black, North or South, would think of so comparing them. When the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Illinois point their finger at the men on this side of the Chamber who represent the South, I say to them that the gentlemen who now sit here representing the South are their peers, morally, intellectually, and in every other respect. It was not so when the control of that section was in the hands of gentlemen on the other side.

But I am not going to be led away from the question legitimately before the Senate. I know where the cry comes from; I know the motives that prompt it.

> No rogue e'er felt the halter draw
> With good opinion of the law,

was quoted with emphasis by the Senator from Illinois. That is the trouble with the other side. The halter is drawing, and drawing very closely, around them; and they have to cry out "revolution" and appropriate every other catch-word that may alarm the ignorant or ill-informed in order to save themselves.

They ask us why we do not appeal to Cæsar. We do not intend to wait for Cæsar. We are making our appeal to the people before Cæsar comes. When the Rubicon is passed and the cry is "Alea jacta est" it is too late to appeal. It is to prevent Cæsar from coming and crushing out liberty with his legions that we desire the soldiers to be kept from the polls.

A word personal to myself. I have been called in the press and on the floor of the Senate a revolutionist. I have heard resolutions read by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] inviting me to a discussion, and I have been taunted because I would not accept his proposition. His charge was based upon the ground that I was seeking to coerce the President of the United States, and that I was endeavoring to do something outrageous to force him to sign bills or starve the Government. I deny it. I have never done anything or said anything here or elsewhere that indicated a desire to do more than my whole duty to this people as I understood their best interests to require me to act. The speech made by me which I hold in my hand and which was read in part by the Senator from Massachusetts has been so much commented upon that I will refer to it again, because I expect to defend it—at least as to the intent with which I made it.

I desire to say one word before I read my remarks on that occasion. It has been said elsewhere by distinguished gentlemen of my own party, that I had asked for more than the House conferees asked; but the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] who was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, before I spoke said on this floor:

> The point of disagreement was the legislative provisions, those (to state them very briefly) relating to the test oath of jurors and the election laws or the appointment of deputy marshals and supervisors. With reference to these legislative propositions contained in the bill the conference was unable to agree, the conferees on the part of the House taking the position that the only condition upon which an agreement could be had was that the conferees on the part of the Senate should recede from all of its disagreeing votes on those points. The conferees on the part of the Senate could not accept those conditions.

He could not be mistaken as to the points of difference as all propositions had to be made to him, even if I was not fully informed. I assumed that he was well-advised as I had heard nothing to the contrary.

I followed him, and in a plain way I insisted that we should agree. I earnestly desired the Senate to agree with the House. I made the short speech or statement late at night without conference with any one; I asked if the Senate would not then, instead of forcing an extra session, agree with the House and allow those, to my mind, very proper things to be made part of our laws, rather than meet in extra session. This was my language:

> Mr. President, I was one of the conferees on the legislative, executive and judicial appropriation bill when two earnest efforts were made to agree, but we found it impossible. The Senator from Minnesota has stated correctly that upon all questions pertaining to the appropriations the great probability is that we could have agreed, though I believe we did not finally agree even as to them. He is also correct in stating that the House conferees insisted upon retaining that portion of the bill to which he has alluded, but it was also equally certain that the majority of the Senate conferees with equal pertinacity insisted upon the Senate amendments, and maintained that each and all the provisions inserted by the House should be stricken out. There was no attempt at any division of the subjects and no proposition looking to any modification was considered. Not desiring to revive any political animosities or any discussion at this late hour, I will only state very briefly what seemed to be the condition of things: the House insisted that the armed soldiers of the United States should not be allowed to approach the polls for the mere purpose of keeping the peace, that there should be an honest jury obtained in the courts of the United States in all cases where the rights and liberties of citizens were involved, and that the States should be allowed to conduct their own elections in their own way, free from all Federal interference, and the democratic conferees on the part of the House seemed determined that unless those rights were secured to the people in the bills sent to the Senate they would refuse, under their constitutional right, to make appropriations to carry on the Government if the dominant majority in the Senate insisted upon the maintenance of these laws and refused to consent to their repeal.
> They seemed further to agree, and I agreed with them, that if an extra session must be called, much as it is to be regretted, the very moment it is called the committees of both Houses would be organized and separate bills would be framed and passed as soon as possible asking the President of the United States to agree with the representatives of the States and people in repealing all laws that authorize the soldiers of the Republic to be sent by any authority whatever to the polls at State elections under the pretense of keeping the peace, and in repealing all laws that prevent men who are by intelligence and interest in the public welfare fit and competent to do justice between citizens and between the United States and citizens in the jury-box from exercising that right, thus depriving the courts the benefit of fair jurors, and they will promptly pass another bill declaring that the United States shall not, either through supervisors, marshals, or deputy marshals, interfere with the States in conducting the elections held within the States. We insist that those matters pertain solely to the States and are part of their absolute right and that they are perfectly competent to attend to them fairly and honestly. When these three laws are submitted to the President for his approval, as they will be, and are approved by him, as they ought to be, the next Congress will in my opinion be ready to pass every appropriation bill, just as it is now, adjourn, and go home without attempting before next December to perfect any further legislation. If, however, the President of the United States, in the exercise of the power vested in him, should see fit to veto the bills thus presented to him, which I repeat will simply be, to keep soldiers from the polls, to allow proper jurors to serve who will try cases honestly, and allow the States to control their own elections, then I have no doubt those same amendments will be again made part of the appropriation bills, and it will be for the President to determine whether he will block the wheels of government and refuse to accept necessary appropriations rather than allow the representatives of the people to repeal odious laws which they regard as subversive of their rights and privileges. We have the undoubted right to repeal them in any form and on any bills we choose. Most of them were imposed upon the country as parts of appropriation bills. Whether that course is right or wrong, it will be adopted, and I have no doubt adhered to, no matter what happens with the appropriation bills.

After a very able speech from the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] in which the jury laws were discussed between him and myself at some length, I repeated my former statement, in substance as follows:

Mr. President, this Congress expires at twelve o'clock to-day, and it is now nearly three. Many votes have yet to be taken on important bills. I have nothing more to add to what I have already stated except this: reference having been made to the bill that passed here on the 20th of December, the day before the recess, repealing section 820, I am advised by a very well-informed member of the House that it went at once to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House; that committee has never been called from that day to this, and, therefore, has been unable under the rules of the House to report it back. Twice on Mondays, when alone motions can be made to suspend the rules, the republicans have had enough members in that body to prevent the democrats from obtaining the necessary two-thirds to suspend the rules. Therefore that bill has not been acted on.

I desire to say that my information is equally reliable that while section 821 could not properly be applied to any citizen if section 820 was repealed, yet the practice, at least in Louisiana, is, and it is being done every day, to exclude jurors who cannot take that oath. I am told that Mr. Leonard, district attorney in the city of New Orleans, a few days ago in a case where forty-five persons were charged with an offense, applied it, and the jurors were driven from the box because they could not take this test oath, although section 821 had been repealed as early as 1873 and was illegally inserted in the Revised Statutes as every judge and district attorney in the United States well knows, and every Senator and Representative in Congress knows it equally well. Yet it is maintained and enforced contrary to law and justice.

As to the revolutionary measures that it is said may be attempted if an extra session is had, I have said what I believe will be done. I only speak for myself. I know nothing positively as to what the democratic Congress will do. But after they have fairly tendered to the President, as they have the undoubted right to do, acts repealing the sections that authorize soldiers to go to the polls to keep the peace and that authorize deputy marshals to order them to go there under any pretense, and acts repealing all the test oaths in reference to jurors, so that men can have honest juries before whom to try their cases, and acts repealing the authority given to the marshals and supervisors at the polls to control the elections, if the President, in the exercise of his constitutional authority, shall see fit to veto measures so just and so fair, so necessary to free government as those laws are, then I for one would again make them part of the appropriation bills and let him exercise his veto power if he determines to perpetuate these wrongs on the bills that appropriate the money necessary to maintain the Government, and let him be responsible by his veto for stopping the wheels of the Government, as he would be if he determines that such measures as these are sufficiently important to keep on the statute-book for partisan purposes to block the wheels of Government. Then the Executive and his aiders and abettors would be responsible to the country, and not the Congress that gave him the opportunity to attach his signature to necessary appropriation bills. I will not occupy the time of the Senate any longer.

It seemed to me best that the Senate should agree to propositions so fair and just, though I had very little hope that it would; temper controlled its judgment, and our opponents hoped to induce the President to sustain them.

We had passed a bill last summer which the President had signed, saying that soldiers should not be used as a posse comitatus, and all we desired now in this bill was to say that they should not under the pretense of keeping the peace be taken as a military organization to the polls. That was all of the provision in the Army bill. It was conceded, it could not be denied, that Congress had repealed the law prohibiting men from sitting in the jury-boxes who could not take the iron-clad oath on the 18th of July, 1871, and by mistake or fraud, I care not which, it was incorporated into the Revised Statutes, and is there wrongfully to-day, a part apparently of the law of the land, and is held by radical judges to be in force as such. Surely the repeal of a fraud was proper on any bill, and all fair-minded men might be assumed to be in favor of correcting an admitted wrong, especially when it worked such palpable injustice. Many of the judges who enforce it could not serve as jurors in their own courts. The other provision sought to be repealed was of an equally flagrant character.

After the exhibits that had been made as to the conduct of marshals and their deputies in Saint Louis, New York, Philadelphia, and elsewhere as to the amount of money spent and as to the corruption and fraud practiced alike by supervisors and by the marshals and deputy marshals, we thought that honorable men of all parties would agree that the time had at last come when they should be wiped out and the people be allowed to hold their own elections in their own way under the laws of the several States. I said so in the short speech which I made, and I said that I believed the democratic party would maintain it. They have not attempted to present separate bills to the President, as I then thought they would, but they have a right to present them in this form, because it is a form usual and sustained by many precedents. Having done so, no other body can question the propriety of the form in which the proposed law is presented. If, as I said, the President sees fit to veto those bills, which I have never believed and do not now believe he will do, then I have never said more than if he does I will consult with the democratic Representatives in Congress as to what is the duty of the democratic party to the country when that calamity happens; but I will never assume that the President will veto a bill which we have a clear, undoubted right to pass, one that neither infringes his constitutional prerogative, nor the constitutional prerogative of the judiciary, nor on any provision of the Constitution of the United States, and that is not hasty or ill-considered legislation. It is beyond the ordinary sphere of the veto power and outside of its legitimate purpose for him to say we shall not repeal what a majority of both Houses of Congress think, after full deliberation, ought to be repealed. Who has authority to say that the President of the United States will veto this bill? Will any Senator on the other side rise and say that he has such authority? Has any gentleman told us why and for what reasons he ought to veto it? Can any one give a reason? Has not the Congress of the United States the right to repeal a law it put upon the statute-book? No man has dared to say it has not. If I or any other gentleman had used expressions that we ought not to have used, and that others think are disagreeable to the President, is that the act of the Congress of the United States? The best thing the Senator from Maine said yesterday, according to my judgment, was this:

There is not the slightest possible denial here that this is a constitutional exercise of power. If there is such a denial it is a mere individual opinion. There has been no adjudication in the least degree looking to the unconstitutionality of these laws. Your individual opinion is no better than mine; mine is no better than that of any other man who can hear a horn blown from the front steps of the Capitol. No individual opinion is worth anything. We have a department of the Government to pass upon the question. The legislative department has enacted these laws under what it believed to be a clear and explicit grant of power, and you have never had it judicially determined otherwise.

That is true; and by the like authority the legislative department of this Government is about to repeal these laws. One House has repealed this provision in the Army bill; this House we believe will do it under exactly the same power that the two Houses acted when they enacted it; and what I may say, or what the Senator from Maine may say, is no more than the individual opinion of any man who can hear a horn blown from the steps of the Capitol, and all attempts to excite the President, or induce him to believe that he is threatened, is the baldest nonsense, no matter who talks.

Is there anything in the bill itself reflecting upon the Executive or infringing on his rights? No; no man will say so.

The Senator from Maine was even kind enough to go so far in his address as to ask, although he was giving us all sorts of good advice:

Will any Senator claim that Congress has not the right to make regulations concerning the manner of holding elections for Representatives?

And the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said:

The grievance is that the American people, acting through their Representatives in the National Legislature, having determined to exercise their clear constitutional power of regulating the manner of national elections, have taken some of the precautions usual in the States in like cases for protecting those elections against violence and fraud.

Certainly; and we propose to change them.

That he said they did in 1865. We propose now, acting in the same legitimate way, to take the precautions which are exercised in nearly all the States against violence and fraud by keeping the Army of the United States from the polls and preventing either John Davenport or any other minion of the Federal Government from interfering with the rights of American citizens when exercising their highest constitutional prerogative. And we are told by these same gentlemen that it is revolutionary to do that! Are we doing more than both the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Massachusetts say was the clear right of Congress to do? The power that passes can repeal. And when the House attached it to the Army bill—for I will speak to the provision now under consideration as closely as I can—I insist that it is beyond the power either of the Senate or the President to make any objection or to raise any point of order as to the propriety of the rules of the House because it was found there when the bill reached the Senate. The decisions of both Houses are uniform on that subject. One will suffice to illustrate all.

Mr. HOAR. Will it be convenient for the Senator from Kentucky to allow me to interrupt him for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. BECK. Unless it is something bearing on this point I would rather proceed further with my statement.

Mr. HOAR. It was precisely on the point the Senator was about leaving.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to go on, if you please. I hardly ever interrupt any one myself, and I have not yet got fairly into my argument.

Mr. HOAR. It was in reference to the Senator's statement of what I said that I desired to put a question.

Mr. BECK. I read every word the Senator said on that point, and made no comment on it except that we were doing precisely what had been done in the case referred to by the Senator. I decline to be interrupted.

When affirmative legislation was embodied into the Army bill in 1867, depriving President Johnson of his rights as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and eleven States of the right to organize the militia, a question was made in the House on these provisions, which were amendments added by the Senate. Mr. Colfax was in the chair. Mr. Finck raised the point of order that the amendment was not germane. The Speaker covered the whole ground:

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain a point of order upon an amendment which has been adopted by the Senate and is sent to this House for concurrence. No such thing is recognized in the whole history of the Government. The Senate has the right to adopt such amendments as it may deem proper, and the House may concur with amendments as it chooses. A point of order cannot be made in this House upon a Senate amendment coming before this House for its concurrence or non-concurrence.

So that when a provision is once incorporated by the House, and especially when it is agreed to by the Senate and when the bill goes to the President, it goes to him in such a form that he must consider each question involved in it upon the merits of the question itself, and give it as full, free, and fair consideration as if each of the items had been sent to him separately, because the House in the exercise of its undoubted power, which he and the Senate cannot control, has sent it there; and I suppose hardly any gentleman will rise in his place, none has yet, to show that this is an improper or an unusual exercise of the authority of the House. Congress has the right "to raise and support armies;" the House originates the bill. Congress has the right to say how the Army shall be used, whether it shall be kept upon the frontier or anywhere else; and when it says that it shall not go to the polls merely to keep the peace, it exercises an undoubted constitutional prerogative.

What, then, is the President to do? I do not assume that he will do what we have been threatened with. I have believed, and I believe now from all he has ever said or done, that he will sign this bill. I have never doubted it, because I think it is his clear duty to do so, and all his past conduct indicates that he will not disregard his duty. I have heretofore said that I believed much of the struggle now going on, much of the cry that is raised about revolution, is raised and maintained in order to see if the stalwart republicans cannot make him act as a party President, and thus through him prevent the repeal of laws they placed on the statute-book when they were in power and which now, having passed into a minority, they clutch at as the only means they have of overawing the people at the polls hereafter and of using the Treasury of the tax-payers to furnish them campaign funds in order to enable them to try again to win. I repeat that I believe the President will sign the bill because he will not consider and he cannot consider anything except the merits of the propositions presented; and the merits are all on our side. I have heard it rumored on apparently high authority that he has said he would veto this bill. An effort has been made all through this debate to induce us to believe that he has said so and that he is outraged at what the democratic party have been doing. If he is outraged at all, he is outraged by and ought to be outraged at the men on the other side who are constantly repeating that he has threatened to veto laws before they were submitted to him. General Grant was President of the United States some time ago, and when it was said that he had threatened to veto a bill in advance of the action of Congress he made this denial to the reporter of the Associated Press:

A "special" having been published in the New York Times of March 21, 1874, purporting to indicate the President's purpose to veto a pending bill, if passed, the President authorized the following denial to be telegraphed by the reporter of the Associated Press, and it was published March 23:

President Grant, in conversation with a leading western republican Senator, said the statement in a Washington dispatch to a New York paper published Saturday morning, that any legislation tending to inflation must run the gauntlet of his veto, was wholly without foundation; that he had conversed with no one on the subject, and if he were a member of Congress he should regard an intimation of a veto in advance of legislation as an unbecoming threat by the Executive, and should resent it.

I assume that the present Executive has as high regard for the proprieties of his exalted position as his predecessor had, and that he has never said or intimated anything as to what he would do, and "hence these tears." It is I think because they fear the President will sign it, as he ought to do, that they are so nervous and excited. Why, sir, can any gentleman contend or has any Senator contended that the Army of the United States ought to be sent to the voting places in the several States, in anticipation of trouble, to keep the peace there without the demand of the Legislature or of the executive of the State when the Legislature cannot be convened?

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

That is true. Each State has to-day a republican form of government; each State in this Union has its regularly organized Legislature, its regularly elected governor; all its State machinery. Its courts are open; justice can be administered without sale, denial, or delay. Its judges, its marshals, its sheriffs, its constabulary force are all in full operation. Its militia can be called out to maintain peace within its borders. No complaint is made from any quarter and, none being made, it is beyond the power of the President and beyond the power of Congress constitutionally to invade a State with the Federal Army and place men at the polls who are wearing the uniform and receiving the pay of the United States to watch and guard the people in the exercise of their constitutional rights and privileges. And when we find a clause authorizing that to be done on the statute-book and propose to repeal it, we are told that the President will veto our repealing law and say that the representatives of the people have not the constitutional right to do it either as part of an appropriation bill or otherwise. He cannot find a member of his Cabinet who could write him an opinion giving reasons and he is required to give reasons why he should veto this bill, in my judgment. He cannot do it himself, because all his action and every thing he has said and done has been against any such position, as I think I can show and as I believe even the Senators who are most clamorous about revolution well know.

Yesterday the Senator from Maine, with an air of triumph like a schoolmaster chastising this side of the House, asked what Senator ever saw a soldier at the polls; and when the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] told him he had seen them in 1870, and my worthy colleague [General WILLIAMS] said he had seen them in 1865, after the war was over, he hooted down the statements and said one had seen a few soldiers seven or eight years ago, and one twelve or fifteen years ago, and asked "Who next?" There were dozens of Senators who could have told him who did not care to be questioned in that arrogant manner or submit to be catechised in that form. I could have told him then of numerous instances since the war where soldiers had been at the polls, placed there for the foulest of purposes, and where soldiers had driven out the Legislatures of States, and could have shown him that their action had been denounced even by republican statesmen high in authority, in the Senate and elsewhere. I propose to tell him of some such cases now. I am speaking in my own time now, and therefore will be able to state facts without interruption, which I could not have done yesterday. Governor Geary, of Pennsylvania, I believe was a loyal man, was he not?

Mr. WALLACE. A general in the Union Army.

Mr. BECK. A major-general in the Army of the United States; he did not send a substitute to the war; he was a loyal governor of Pennsylvania, and this is what he said to his Legislature in a solemn message on the 4th of January, 1871, after the first supervisor-marshal law was passed:

The employment of United States troops at elections, without the consent of the local and State governments, has recently received considerable attention and reprehension. It is regarded as an interference with the sovereign rights of the States which was not contemplated by the founders of the General Government, and if persisted in must lead to results disastrous to peace and harmony. The practice is one so serious in its character and so injurious in its tendencies as to merit prompt consideration and decisive action, not only by the General Assembly but by Congress. One of the complaints of the colonists against the British King was the oppression growing out of the assumption of this power. They said, "He has kept among us in times of peace standing armies without the consent of our legislature;" and what is especially pertinent to the case in point, "He has affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power." The alleged authority for the use of troops at our State elections is derived from the tenth section of an act of Congress, approved May 31, 1870, entitled "An act to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of the Union, and for other purposes," which authorizes United States marshals to call to their assistance "such portion of the land and naval forces of the United States or of the militia as may be necessary to the performance of the duty with which they are charged, and to insure a faithful observance of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States." But it must be a forced construction of this law that will justify the presence of armed national forces at our places of election when no necessity exists therefor, and where their presence is calculated to provoke collision. With a good President the exercise of the power referred to might have no injurious results, but in the hands of a bad man governed by personal ambition it might prove exceedingly calamitous. Unconsciously a good President might be induced to employ it wrongfully; a bad would be almost certain to use it for his own advancement. Under any circumstances, in my opinion, it is unsafe and antagonistic to the principles that should govern our republican institutions. At the last October election United States troops were stationed in Philadelphia for the avowed purpose of enforcing the election laws. This was done without the consent or even the knowledge of the civil authorities of either the city or the State, and without any expressed desire on the part of the citizens and as far as can be ascertained without existing necessity. From a conscientious conviction of its importance I have called your attention to this subject. A neglect to have done so might have been construed as an indorsement of a measure that meets my unqualified disapproval. The civil authorities of Pennsylvania have always been and are still competent to protect its citizens in the exercise of their elective franchise, and the proper and only time for the United States military forces to intervene would be when the power of the Commonwealth is exhausted and their aid is lawfully required.

There is one case proven abundantly. The governor of New York, Governor Hoffman, at the same time addressed his Legislature. He said:

Since the adjournment of the Legislature the Federal Government has assumed to interfere directly, by its officers and armed forces, with elections in this State. The pretext was fear that the right of suffrage would, in some way, be denied to the class of persons upon whom it had been conferred by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. It was a mere pretext; for our State Legislature at its last session promptly altered our election laws to conform with that amendment so soon as it was declared adopted. Moreover, this class of voters had exercised their new right freely and without the least molestation at our State election, which took place in May last.

Congress, nevertheless, enacted a law for the ostensible purpose of supervising the election of Congressmen only; and the President was authorized to employ the Army and Navy to enforce certain of its provisions. Under color of this act, the President and other United States officials claimed the right to supervise the entire election, not only for Representatives in Congress, but for State and local officers. In the city of New York special preparations were made to enforce this claim. A large number of United States deputy marshals—

These are the gentlemen who are now preserving the purity of the election, and about whose dismissal so much lamentation is had—

A large number of United States deputy marshals and supervisors were appointed, many of whom were men of well-known disreputable character, and some of whom had been convicted criminals; a class of dangerous men never before chosen by any ruling authority, in any community, as conservators of the peace. They were instructed, under advice of the Attorney-General of the United States, to submit to no interference from any quarter under State or municipal authority. Orders were issued which authorized them, in the discretion of each one of them, to arrest at the polls citizens claiming the right to vote, as well as the inspectors who were charged by law with the custody of the ballot-boxes. These arrests were to be effected without process of law issued upon formal complaints.

Then going on and telling what steps he had taken with the best militia in the United States and the best organized regiments of New York to guard all the rights of every citizen, he said:

Notwithstanding all this, by the President's orders, United States troops were brought from distant posts and quartered in the city of New York, and ships of war were anchored in its harbor. It was certainly not unreasonable to expect that the first drop of citizen's blood shed in the city of New York by Federal troops, in time of peace, might lead to terrible results, involving great loss of life and incalculable destruction of property.

* * * * * * *

At the last moment, that is to say, the afternoon immediately before the election, the officers of the United States, fortunately and wisely, abandoned the extreme ground they had taken, and entered into a stipulation with the local authorities of New York City in my presence, which resulted in preventing any armed interference by troops, either of the United States or of the State.

Governor Hoffman closes his message thus; I fully indorse his statement:

To depend for the peace and order of localities on the Federal Army is not self-government; to substitute the regular soldier with his musket as a peace officer in place of the constable with his writ is not to preserve the peace but to establish the condition of war; to surrender elections to the control of the President supported by armed forces is to surrender liberty and to abandon a republic.

That is another well authenticated case of interference by United States soldiers under Federal authority.

The governor of Illinois, Governor Palmer, himself a gallant soldier, in a message to his Legislature repeated substantially the same state of case and denounced the presence of armed troops at the polls in language perhaps more emphatic than either of the others. I had his message in my hand this morning but somehow or other in the confusion I have mislaid it, and therefore I can only state the substance of what he said. But, sir, Geary and Hoffman, the governors of Pennsylvania and New York, were backed in all their assertions by the governor of the great State of Illinois in denunciation of the conduct of the Federal Government; so that, leaving out the South, the two greatest States in the Union and the fourth State through their governors in solemn messages to their Legislatures have announced the fact which the Senator from Maine ridiculed yesterday, that troops were at the polls in violation of the law and of the Constitution without their consent, and against their will to the overthrow of the State constitution and laws, and they were not there for the purpose of maintaining peace but for the purpose of overthrowing and destroying liberty at the polls.

Yesterday the Senator from Maine said that I was afraid of an extremely small number of troops; that there were none in Kentucky; that there were twenty-one in Georgia, and my friend General GORDON was appealed to to know if he was alarmed on that account; that there were none in Tennessee and none in West Virginia—a few scattered in some localities—not enough to do any harm anywhere. That was laid before the American Senate and people as an argument why we should not seek to remove them and keep them from the polls. I hold in my hand the order of "J. D. CAMERON, Secretary of War, by command of General Sherman," when it was determined that Louisiana should be carried by force or fraud or in any other way in 1876. This order was issued, taking advantage of a House resolution which had been passed saying that the courts and the authorities of the various States should punish crimes wherever they found them. Acting upon what he called the spirit of that resolution, and without a call from the Legislatures or governors of any of the States, in plain, palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States, the order proceeds:

The President directs that, in accordance with the spirit of the above, you are to hold all the available force under your command (not now engaged in subduing the savages of the western frontier) in readiness to be used, upon the call or requisition of the proper legal authorities, for protecting all citizens, without distinction of race, color, or political opinion, in the exercise of the right to vote as guaranteed by the fifteenth amendment; and to assist in the enforcement of "certain, condign, and effectual punishment" upon all persons who shall "attempt, by force, fraud, terror, intimidation, or otherwise, to prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage," as provided by the laws of the United States, and have such force so distributed and stationed as to be able to render prompt assistance in the enforcement of the law.

Such additional orders as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of these instructions will be given to you from time to time, after consultation with the law officers of the Government.

Under that order forty-five hundred soldiers were at once started from the West to those States to take possession of them, and an order was issued to them to obey whatever the marshals or any of the other (so called) authorities placed there for partisan purposes should put upon them. The result is known. Although there may be only a few troops scattered about now, when an important election comes then they can be concentrated, and concentrated rapidly where they will do the most good, and where they will deprive the people of the largest number of votes who desire to vote against the party which they are ordered to uphold, for the soldier blindly obeys the orders of his superior in nine cases out of ten. He forgets that he is a citizen, or that any citizen has rights that he is bound to respect, if his superior officer orders him to disregard them.

Recollect, and this must never be forgotten, that when the law we seek to modify was passed there were no marshals nor deputy-marshals nor supervisors of elections. There were no John Davenports, and there were no thieves, robbers, or other convicts, appointed because they were such, who were authorized to take command of the Federal Army. The Federal Army was commanded by its officers, gentlemen, many of them democrats, all of them law-abiding citizens. But after a while supervisors were appointed and deputy-marshals paid at the rate of $5 a day, and the secret-service fund was put into their hands in violation of law to swell it out. They were empowered and commissioned to take charge of the Army of the United States, under a pretense of guarding the purity of congressional elections. What followed? Congress, a radical Congress, passed a law fixing a uniform day for holding the elections for members of Congress on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November. That was the day fixed by the Constitution and the laws for the election of President of the United States all over the United States. That was the day to which nine-tenths of the States had conformed in the election of their governors, auditors, attorneys-general, and their State Legislatures, indeed, of all their local authorities. The United States, under the pretense of guarding the election of a member of Congress, sent its marshals and its deputy-marshals into all those States when a President was to be elected, and when governors were to be elected, when all the authorities, legislative and judicial, of the State were to be elected, and they exercised precisely the same authority over the whole election as though they had been absolute masters for every purpose, instead of being there only to see that members of Congress were properly voted for. It was a fraud under a hypocritical pretense, a wearing of the livery of the court of Heaven to serve the devil in.

The proof is abundant in two reports before the State Legislatures and before the Congress of the United States. I may as well mention the fact here that a man by the name of Davenport arrested over three thousand citizens in the city of New York without knowing whether they were going to vote for members of Congress or not, without inquiring whether they were going to vote for members of Congress or not, on the assumption that their naturalization papers were not valid, though issued ten years before, because the clerk in 1868, ten years before, as I said, had failed to note them on the record. The judge (Blatchford) in Coleman's case decided, and the district attorney agreed beforehand, that he had no right to make those arrests; yet it was done, and he was maintained and sustained; and we are told the President of the United States is going to veto a bill which seeks to get clear of a man like that and of a system like that; and we are charged, arraigned, indicted, and denounced because we seek to repeal the law that infamous man boasted as having been drawn by him, and that he had passed through Congress by his influence over conference committees, in order that he might rob the people's Treasury and annul the laws of New York.

Will any man pretend that the Federal Government has a right to invade the States of New York or Pennsylvania and interfere with the election of a President, or interfere with the election of a governor or any of the State officials? I answer no; and yet under the baldest pretense, taking advantage of the fact that by the constitution and laws of these States the Tuesday after the first Monday in November is the day fixed for the general elections, Congress forced them to elect members of Congress on that day for no other purpose than to take control by United States marshals and deputy marshals of all the machinery of the States and to exercise absolute control in regard to the presidential and State as well as the congressional elections; and then Senators tell us we must submit to all these flagrant wrongs forever and we are revolutionary if we attempt to repeal a law which confers such power and which has that broad, sweeping consequence for evil, and evil only.

I should like to see any President give a reason to a Congress for vetoing a measure which had been deliberately passed with such messages by the governors of New York and Pennsylvania as these I have read, with such facts as we have before us in our official reports, when we say to him respectfully, "We will give you all the money your Army wants; we will protect the frontier; we will enable you to guard against insurrection and invasion; we have inserted into the bill that we do not desire in any manner to limit your power to aid the people of all the States whenever they are in danger from insurrection or from foreign war, or when you are called upon by any State for any purpose to send forces to assist them; we are willing to go to the utmost extent and to authorize you to spend all the money you require to do it." There is not a democrat here, I assert before the American people, who will not go as far as any republican on the other side of this Chamber to maintain the peace and order of every State in this Union and protect the rights of every citizen thereof. But we say that "you shall not when not called upon and when there is no necessity interfere and send your soldiers to the polls when elections are pending to be used as the governors of these great States complain that troops have been used, and as the reports to Congress show has been the case, to overthrow liberty and destroy the ballot they pretend to protect."

Mr. President, there never was an army sent into a State to guard apy of its rights under the constitutional provisions on the call of the Legislature, or the call of the governor when the Legislature could not be convened, without the President issuing a proclamation commanding the insurgents to disperse. I should like to know when he sends his soldiers to the polls in the various States what proclamation he is going to issue in time of profound peace, when citizens have assembled to exercise the highest rights of freemen, the only attribute of sovereignty they possess; what proclamation he is going to issue then before he surrounds them with the Federal soldiery. Is he going to proclaim that they are insurgents if there is a democratic majority at the voting place? Is he going to order citizens assembled to vote to disperse and leave the polls to his soldiers so that they may be closed? No, Mr. President, it is an insult to suggest such action. It is an unconstitutional, illegal interference whenever it is attempted. On the bare statement of the proposition it must be so conceded by everybody who is not the victim of passion or prejudice. States alone can keep the peace at the polls. It is the peace of the States that must be preserved. If murder is committed State laws alone can punish for murder. The United States courts have no jurisdiction over such cases, and their officials cannot interfere in such breaches of the peace.

I said that I relied upon the President of the United States, and I have a right to do so. He reversed the policy of his predecessor when he came into power. He said the peaceful modes of the Constitution should be adopted. Up to this time I know of no act of his which has not shown that he was in good faith in making those declarations. I have his inaugural address before me, a word or two from which will perhaps attract the attention of Senators. He said among other things:

The permanent pacification of the country upon such principles and by such measures as will secure the complete protection of all its citizens in the free enjoyment of all their constitutional rights is now the one subject in our public affairs which all thoughtful and patriotic citizens regard as of supreme importance.

* * * * * * *

But it must not be forgotten that only a local government which recognizes and maintains inviolate the rights of all is a true self-government.

Resting upon this sure and substantial foundation, the superstructure of beneficent local governments can be built up, and not otherwise. In furtherance of such obedience to the letter and the spirit of the Constitution, and in behalf of all that its attainment implies, all so-called party interests lose their apparent importance, and party lines may well be permitted to fade into insignificance. The question we have to consider for the immediate welfare of those States of the Union is the question of government or no government, of social order and all the peaceful industries and the happiness that belong to it, or a return to barbarism. It is a question in which every citizen of the nation is deeply interested, and with respect to which we ought not to be, in a partisan sense, either republicans or democrats, but fellow-citizens and fellow-men, to whom the interests of a common country and a common humanity are dear.

Such were the views of the President as embodied in his inaugural address. Such, I say, has been up to this time so far as I know his practice, and such I believe it will continue to be; and in furtherance of that I believe he will indorse and approve all the legislation that we propose to tender to him for his approval, and that no amount of clamor, no amount of denunciation, or threat by indictment, arraignment or abuse of southern men, of talk outside of our capturing the Capitol, is going to deter him from doing his duty. When he is so deterred, then, and not till then, will I change my opinion about him and his views. Southern men capture the Capitol! I appeal to the country with as much emphasis as the gentlemen on the other side, and ask what have we done since genuine southern men have taken position here that has not been for the good of the whole country? Have we robbed and plundered the Treasury? Have we been in favor of the pet banks and bondholders and monopolies and susidies and all the corrupting influences and machinery that were the rule and not the exception years ago? Have we not maintained local self-government and the equal rights of all men everywhere? Have we not sought to make the civil superior to the military power? Have we not favored fair trials by jury, honest elections conducted by the States themselves, and the just maintenance of all the powers of the Federal Government in all those great national affairs that reach beyond the boundary of the States? What southern man has deviated from that course? None, and if the contrast were to be drawn between the Southern States themselves now in their local governments and as they were when it was my fortune as one of a joint committee known as the Ku Klux Committee to go over a good part of them and sit in this Capitol for months and hear of their condition, the contrast would be sharper still. With these facts understood by the people, the speech of the Senator from Illinois, with all its declamation, with all the rant and bitterness there was in it, would fall to the ground crushed by the honest truth of the case.

I see before me my friend from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.] His State was alluded to as a specimen of democratic misrule. Under radical rule it was a pandemonium; there was no peace and no order; colored men called militia were roaming about with guns and bayonets, uncontrolled by law. The President of the United States sent a military order to the Senate, ignoring the House, in which he said that unless something was done with the State so as to take care of it, he would have to see to it with the military arm of the Government. Judge Poland, however, went there with a committee of the House; made a report which showed that misgovernment was at the bottom of the condition of affairs there; the report was sustained; we obtained a breathing spell; GARLAND was elected governor, and what happened? Order came out of chaos, peace was restored, taxes were reduced more than one-half, white and black fraternized and lived harmoniously together; to-day the State of Arkansas is as peaceable as the State of Massachusetts. GARLAND was a revolutionist! He was exactly the kind of a revolutionist that every good democrat in America is. He put the bayonet down and he exalted the civil power; he removed the plunderer and the robber, and he restored peace and harmony to white and black, with equal rights to all and exclusive privileges to none.

So I could point to State after State of the South where similar results followed democratic ascendency, but I will not take the time of the Senate to do it. These facts are a sufficient answer to all that was said by the Senator from Illinois on the subject. That Senator asked why did not the negroes vote as they used to vote; why do they now sustain Hampton and others? You may lie to a negro and fool him for a while; it is not hard to deceive him; but as soon as he finds that you have deceived him you will not easily deceive him a second time; it is your fault the first time, it is his next. He believed in the forty acres of land and the mule for a while. He bought the little painted stakes that were said to come from the Treasury Department and staked off forty acres which were said to be his, and paid from $3 to $5 apiece for the stakes, as was proved time and again. He saw that all those things were false, and he fell back upon the only true friends he ever had, his old master and the democratic party, who have stood by him and are standing by him now, and if left alone they will bring him up to the highest point of civilization of which he is capable at the earliest possible moment.

I will now refer to something the Senator from Maine said yesterday. I beg pardon for making such a disconnected, rambling speech. I have thought a good deal in regard to these subjects. I had occasion to go to Kentucky ten days ago, and while I was gone there was such an able and exhaustive debate, on our side at least, in the other House that when I read speech after speech made by the democrats there I felt as though the subject was exhausted, and but for the fact that I have been attacked and called a revolutionist, and such mean things have been said about me in the newspapers and elsewhere, I would not have opened my mouth now. But as I am up, first one thing and then another occurs to me; I have a good many references to authorities and precedents; it may take me a good while yet to conclude. What the Senator from Maine said occurs to me first: that we were disgracing the American people in the eyes of all Europe by our folly; that we were making the people there believe that our Government is a military despotism; that confidence is being shaken in us; he not only implored us to desist, but he denounced us because we were saying things about the republican party and about military rule in this country that was bringing disgrace upon us. It is not the democratic party that is responsible for that. The democratic party want to remove the cause that makes all good men everywhere denounce the bayonet policy, for I have never yet seen a man, I do not care whether he is a republican or a democrat, who does not denounce the use of military at the polls. There never was a man, whig, democrat, republican, or federalist, who has not said that nothing but the direst necessity would ever warrant military interference anywhere in time of peace. Senators on both sides remember, the people of Europe heard, everybody heard the Secretary of State, after Sheridan had invaded the Legislature of Louisiana and De Trobriand had his troops at her breast, after a bogus government was established at the point of the bayonet and after the military orders were carried out there that disgraced the civilization of the age—a great meeting was called at Cooper Institute. The present Secretary of State was one of the orators. I turned to one of the leading papers of New York of that date in the Library this morning. Not being able to carry it over, I copied what Mr. Evarts said on that occasion—that speech went to the people of Europe—in bitter denunciation of the conduct of the republican party and of the use of the military at the polls. Nothing that I have said and nothing that any democrat can say is more vigorous than that speech.

Our fellow-citizens of New York—

Said Mr. Evarts, at Cooper Institute, on the 11th day of January, 1875. I commend the whole speech to Senators. It can be found in any one of the New York papers of January 12, in the Library, by calling on Mr. Spofford:

Our fellow-citizens of New York have the understanding that patriotism and love of liberty and obedience to the Constitution are not in the possession of any political organization—

I wish the Senator from Illinois could only understand that great truth as the citizens of New York were presumed to do—that there are limits to their political competition and their antagonisms which no political party can safely pass. That when men vote and when their chosen officers meet and when without violence and without demonstration of insurrection they undertake to conduct the affairs of their political governments no soldiers can interfere. [Cheers.]

* * * * * * * *

There are two very distinct firm lines of limitation, which, observed, will protect the machinery of the Government for the people, forty millions of people to-day, one hundred millions hereafter, that is, that the sole intervention of the Federal power within State authority shall be to suppress violence, and that their office after that shall not assume to go further unless when invited by the supreme authority of the State. [Cheers.] And that supreme authority of the State is named in the Federal Constitution, and is the Legislatures of the several States, and only in the casual condition when the Legislature is not in session can the governor represent the State, so as to demand Federal intervention in the political affairs of the State but only on the condition that the Legislature cannot be convened.

Again he said:

Now, the laws of Congress require whenever a state of violence exists in a State to which Federal suppression should be applied that the exercise of that authority must be combined by a proclamation requiring the insurgents to disperse.

* * * * * * * *

What use is it to give the purse and the sword to the House of Commons if the King or the President by military power can determine what shall be the constitution of the House of Commons or the House of Congress? And that is what they fought for in England—

The Senator from Massachusetts thought they fought over the King or Queen's pin-money—some little trifle of that sort—

And that is what they fought for in England—the indubitable and ancient rights of Parliament to hold the purse when in danger, from the claims of royal power. For a while the House of Lords assumed the power and right to determine the qualification and membership of the House of Commons, but in 1624, the House of Commons determined that the qualifications of its members was at its own disposal, that the ancient liberties of the House of Commons required it, and no King and no House of Lords has questioned this power of the House of Commons from that day to this. [Applause.] And for this reason the people of the United States are justified in assuming that the supreme civil power shall dominate over the military, and that no merging of them, or interference with them shall be permitted; to see that there shall be an independent Legislature with an absolute absence of Federal power except on the invocation of the Legislature for the suppression of actual violence and its immediate withdrawal when the violence is suppressed.

When Mr. Evarts discussed that great question in the bold, manly way he did, and as many other able men did, there was no man who dared to deny that it was the interference by the Federal soldiery at the polls when elections were held or Legislatures sought to organize that was at the bottom of all our troubles. My friend from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] read a few words the other day from Mr. Seward. I propose to read more extensively from Mr. Seward's speech. I said there was no difference of opinion among men, whig, democrat, federalist, radical, no matter what you call them, on this subject. I select Mr. Seward as being more in accord with the politics of gentlemen on the other side than others who were equally pronounced against military interference with civil rights or personal liberty. Mr. Seward said in the great speech made by him in the Senate of the United States in 1856:

The time was, and that not long ago, when a proposition to employ the standing Army of the United States as a domestic police would have been universally denounced as a premature revelation of a plot, darkly contrived in the chambers of conspiracy, to subvert the liberties of the people and to overthrow the Republic itself.

I have sometimes thought that the movements that have been made lately were of the character Mr. Seward apprehended at that time:

The Republic stands upon a fundamental principle, that the people in the exercise of equal rights will establish only just and equal laws, and that their own free and enlightened public opinion is the only legitimate reliance for the maintenance and execution of such laws. This principle is not even peculiar to ourselves; it lies at the foundation of the government of every free people on earth. It is public opinion, not the imperial army, that executes the laws of the realm in England, Scotland, and Ireland. Whenever France is free, it is public opinion that executes the laws of her republican legislature. It is public opinion that executes the laws in all the cantons of Switzerland. The British constitution is quite as jealous of standing armies as a police as our own. Government there, indeed, maintains standing armies, as it does a great naval force, but it employs the one, as it does the other, exclusively for defense or for conquest against foreign states. Fearful lest the armed power of the state might be turned against the people to enforce obnoxious edicts or statutes, the British constitution forbids that any regular army whatever shall be tolerated on any pretense. The considerable military force which is maintained in different and distant parts of the empire only exists by a suspension of that part of the constitution, which suspension is renewed by Parliament from year to year, and never for more than one year at a time.

Civil liberty and a standing army for the purposes of civil police have never yet stood together, and never can stand together. If I am to choose, sir, between upholding laws in any part of this Republic which cannot be maintained without a standing army, or relinquishing the laws themselves, I give up the laws at once, by whomsoever they are made and by whatever authority; for either our system of government is radically wrong, or such laws are unjust, unequal, and pernicious.

I might read through that great speech for the edification of gentlemen on the other side, but I believe I will content myself with only reading again what was read the other day by my friend from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD:]

If the founders of the Constitution had been told that within seventy years from the day on which they laid its solid foundations and raised its majestic columns a standing army would have been found necessary and indispensable merely to execute municipal laws, they would have turned shuddering away from the massive depotism which they had erected.

So I say, and so say the democratic party, that whenever there is no longer virtue enough, intelligence enough, love of liberty enough, and integrity enough in the States of this Union to maintain their own police authority and to see justice done to all their people, and see to the just and honest execution of their own laws, then liberty is gone, there is an end of popular government, there is an end of republican liberty regulated by law. There must be trust somewhere. That trust was established by the Constitution in the governments of the States. Why, sir, if a State has not intelligence or integrity enough to see that its citizens have an equal right to a fair and honest vote, that their votes are fairly counted, and that the count when made is fairly declared, which is one of the simplest of operations, then it has no right to be a State; and the same relation that a gentleman from Illinois wanted it to bear—that is, the same relation to the Federal Government that the counties do to the States—ought to be established, and there will be at once a great central despotism at Washington, the source and the center from which all power must radiate. Then your "man on horseback" will come, and come speedily, and rule from Maine to California through marshals and deputy marshals and Treasury agents and spies and informers, with Whitely and Davenport and all the thieves at their head; then you will have a Government such as will suit the gentlemen who desire protection against the people, for liberty regulated by law will be a farce and a mockery. That is the republican theory of government as maintained now by opposition to the repeal of the laws we propose to annul.

We take exactly the opposite side. We believe that wherever the family can manage its own affairs nobody should interfere with the affairs of that family; beyond that when you come to the school district or to the public highways in your respective parishes, we believe they should be attended to by those people who are interested; and when you get beyond that to your townships, to your municipalities, to your counties, to your hundreds, as they were called in the old days in England, let the people in those divisions manage their affairs to suit themselves in their respective localities free from outside interference. Passing beyond that and reaching up to the States, let their elections be by their own people, under their own regulations, without the interposition of the laws of Congress or the interference of the Federal Government, or the Army either, as constables or anything else. Let the people alone; let them manage their own affairs and punish by State laws all wrong-doers. When you come to the aggregation of States, to the power to regulate commerce among the States, to carry on foreign diplomacy, to see that all men in each State regardless of race or color are protected in all their rights, that no one shall interfere with or interrupt them, I agree that the Federal Government is supreme; and every democrat here stands by the right and power and maintains its supremacy as emphatically as any republican on the other side. There is where the great distinction in our political creed and practice lies, and there is the difference between the parties on this question. We believe in individual liberty. We believe in the power and right of local self-government and the equal rights of men. We believe that the great mass of mankind were not born saddled and bridled, and a favored few born booted and spurred, ready to ride them by the grace of God. We believe all citizens are equal, that States are equal, and that the people of the States are honest and can attend to their own affairs quite as well as Federal officials.

A good deal has been said about the bill we propose to modify being a law signed by Abraham Lincoln—"the martyred President"—and we are told that he would rise from his grave and enter these Halls; and I do not know what he would not do, run us out, I presume, if we dared to repeal or amend a bill he had signed. There has been a good deal of threatening, a good deal of indicting, and a good deal of talk about terrible things that were going to happen portrayed by the Senator from Maine, and it was all told again to-day by the Senator from Illinois, if we dared to repeal this law. That sort of talk does not frighten grown men, and need not be answered; the people understand it. But I was astonished at the Senator from Illinois repeating a statement that was made the other day elsewhere. I am not at liberty to say where, but in a very distinguished place in this city—I believe the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] generally speaks of it in that way, to keep within the rules—by a very distinguished gentleman, that the provision of law we propose to repeal was drawn, prepared, maintained, and sustained by a democratic Senator, and would not be the law to-day but for the fact that a Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Powell) brought it up before Congress, maintained it, and advocated it. The names of distinguished men—my friend [Mr. PENDLETON] among others—were read the other day elsewhere as its advocates by a gentleman speaking of it, and there were enough men in a large assembly in this city, who ought to be intelligent enough to know better, that applauded the statement to the echo, either because they were so ignorant that they did not know any better, or because they hoped to deceive somebody by applauding it as though they thought it was true, when, if they had any intelligence at all, or enough to entitle them to represent anybody anywhere, they knew that there was not a word of truth in it. Whether the applause came from their desire to deceive somebody else or their ignorance—perhaps it was like this talk about coercion now—I do not know, and I do not care; but the fact is known to every decently intelligent man—and any man who states otherwise is either too ignorant to be here or he is seeking to fool somebody—that Governor Powell when he introduced that bill introduced it substantially as it will stand if we succeed in repealing the clause we are seeking to repeal now; and in one of the very ablest speeches ever made on the floor of the Senate he showed the necessity for the passage of the law he proposed. The title is "An act to prevent officers of the Army and Navy and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States from interfering in elections in the States." It is without any limitation—no exception such as to keep the peace at the polls—nor for any other illegal or fraudulent purpose. The object was to keep them, on any pretext whatever, from interfering with the States or people in the conduct of their elections. That bill, as presented by Governor Powell and advocated by him, resulted from the condition of things produced by or growing out of the war; and there were many things perhaps allowable then that would not be at all permissible now. It resulted from troubles growing out of the war in all the border States—in Kentucky, Missouri, Maryland, Delaware, to say nothing of Tennessee, because she was at one time a member of the confederacy; but in Mayland, Missouri, Kentucky, Delaware, and along the border, extending into Southern Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, the military were in the habit not only of interfering in the elections but of conducting the elections of State, county, and municipal officers, closing the polls against all candidates and votes they did not like, and opening them to their pets and favorites.

General Gilbert invaded a democratic convention in 1863 in Kentucky and dispersed it at the point of the bayonet, only followed by three or four soldiers. We should have been no more afraid of those three or four soldiers than we would be of the one, two, three, or four the Senator from Maine yesterday insisted were scattered about the border States now; but that Federal general with three or four soldiers arbitrarily dispersed a convention of five hundred or six hundred democrats, without opposition or show of resistance, because he represented the whole power of the United States. During that summer martial law was declared in Kentucky, and officers were sent to the polls to say who should vote and who should not, who should be allowed to stand as candidates and who should not. I have their reports lying before me, showing that they closed voting place after voting place and poll after poll in Kentucky to all the opponents of their friends, and refused to allow ballots to be cast for men as loyal and true in every proper sense of the word as the commanding general himself or as any man in this Hall. Hon. Charles A. Wickliffe, a former Postmaster-General of the United States, was the democratic candidate for governor. He had sat in the Congress of the United States in the early part of the war, and had voted for men and money to carry it on; but he called himself a democrat—he was a true, honest, earnest, able democrat—and he was opposed to many of the ultra measures which were then being urged; consequently the polls were closed at various points in the State against him, and Federal officers, captains, majors, and others whose reports I have in my hand, would not allow loyal citizens to go to the polls, or even allow a poll to be opened for Mr. Wickliffe as candidate for governor of Kentucky, and so it was in many other States. Yet the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and a distinguished gentleman in the other House assert—I could not make anybody believe it in the face of these facts if I did not read it—the Senator from Massachusetts said:

> There has been no time since the formation of the Government when a single person has been restrained or intimidated in casting his vote by any military power whatever.

And as that is assumed to be the case, we are charged with being revolutionists when we are asking to remove the military power from keeping the peace at the polls.

Mr. HOAR. This was during the war, was it not? Was not this instance that the Senator from Kentucky speaks of during the war?

Mr. BECK. It was.

Mr. HOAR. And in the district which had been overrun by the troops of both armies?

Mr. BECK. No, sir; it was all over the State in districts that never were overrun.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the State of Kentucky was the theater of war.

Mr. BECK. Let me read again. Perhaps the gentleman did not understand what he was talking about himself. He said:

> There has been no time since the formation of the Government when a single person has been restrained or intimidated in casting his vote by any military power whatever.

Eighteen hundred and sixty-three was long after the formation of the Government.

Mr. HOAR. I did not allude to the conventions which were held down South to aid what was called the rebellion. They were intimidated by military force, undoubtedly.

Mr. BECK. Let me say that the State of Kentucky during all that time was paying her taxes to the Federal Government; she was furnishing men and money; she had from sixty to eighty thousand men in the Federal armies; and she was furnishing soldiers to Massachusetts as substitutes for your now ardent patriots.

Mr. BLAINE. One moment just here, if the Senator will permit an interruption. The Senator from Kentucky speaks of the then Senator, Lazarus W. Powell, I believe, having been interfered with in his right to vote when the colleague of that Senator in this very Chamber moved his expulsion from this body because of disloyalty.

Mr. BECK. I said no such thing about Senator Powell——

Mr. BLAINE. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. BECK. Yes; you are apt to misunderstand. The Senator from Maine ought to know that the colleague of that Senator, Mr. Garrett Davis, afterward rose on the floor of the Senate and made an apology more handsome than the Senator from Maine is apt to make when he does a colleague an injustice. He said that he had been mistaken from beginning to end, and in the face of the Senate he walked up and shook hands with Mr. Powell and asked his forgiveness publicly because he had done him injustice. I made no allusion to personal matters.

Mr. BLAINE rose.

Mr. BECK. I am not going to be interrupted now. I did not seek to bring in personal matters and I had made no allusion to anything except great public facts. I have the speech of Mr. Powell in which he showed, taking State after State, that there would be injustice done unless there was some bill of the kind proposed by him passed; and he referred to and successfully overthrew report No. 14, made by Mr. Howard, of Michigan, against the bill, in which report those gentlemen who agreed with Mr. Howard claimed the right of the military to interfere, and admitted that they had interfered, although it is now said no man was ever interfered with by the military. Military interference went so far that Mr. Lincoln himself, in the State of Maryland, had to rescind orders of General Schenck, on the ground that it was improper for the military to interfere to the extent that General Schenck was interfering. He rescinded three of his orders, allowing only one of them to stand, and that was simply to aid the civil authorities. Proof was made that in Maryland as well as in Kentucky the polls were closed in many places against democratic candidates and voters. Mr. Lincoln interfered at the request of the governor, who sent an indignant message to his Legislature, and at the request of Hon. Reverdy Johnson, then one of the Senators from Maryland, saying that there could be no free election in Maryland at that time because of military interference. Was not that the fact? The Senators from Maryland know it. What was the truth about that, I should like to ask him? [Turning to Mr. GROOME.] What does he remember about the elections in 1863, 1864, and 1865? The elections now referred to were held then. They are mentioned in this report.

Mr. WHYTE. I can furnish the Senator the message of the loyal governor of Maryland on the subject.

Mr. BECK. The Senators from Maryland in their own time, when they have the opportunity, will state the facts. The fact is plain that the elections were interfered with there as in Kentucky by the soldiers.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. About the only arrest history has given us a record of in Maryland that amounted to anything was the arrest of the Maryland Legislature by McClellan, who is now the democratic governor of New Jersey, and was a democratic candidate for President of the United States against Abraham Lincoln. That is about the only history we have of arrests in Maryland, when the Legislature was arrested by him.

Mr. BECK. That only proves what I have said and believe, that no matter how good a man may be, when he once becomes a military officer and subject to obey the orders of the authorities over him, he becomes a tool in their hands; he is obliged to do whatever he is told or ordered to do, and he is an unsafe depository of power over a free people, especially at the polls when they are depositing their ballots to say who shall be their rulers, and if he is a democrat so much the worse.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will remember, however——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator must address the Chair if he wishes to interrupt.

Mr. LOGAN. I will, Mr. President. The Senator will remember, however, that General McClellan made that arrest on his own authority, without being ordered by the President of the United States.

Mr. BECK. I do not know how that is. That was not at the polls.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the fact as I have stated it.

Mr. BECK. No doubt; and when Governor Powell brought up this bill and the adverse report was read he persisted in passing it, the adverse report to the contrary notwithstanding, and endeavored to have it passed just as presented by him. Mr. Pomeroy, of Kansas, introduced the amendment to allow soldiers "to keep the peace at the polls," because he said that in troublous times in Kansas he had seen occasions when it was necessary that soldiers should be there in order to guard and protect the right of citizens to vote; and when the vote was taken in the Senate by yeas and nays on that amendment every democrat voted against it; and yet the Senator from Illinois to-day said a democratic Senator had placed this amendment upon the statute-book, as I understood him. I understood the Senator from Illinois to-day to say that this very law authorizing the troops to go to the polls was placed there at the instance of a democratic Senator. Am I correct?

Mr. LOGAN. I said this law was introduced by a democratic Senator.

Mr. BECK. The law as it will stand after we strike out this clause was.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that; but the law as amended was voted for by democrats and the original bill was introduced by Senator Powell, of Kentucky. The amendment was put to it, I agree, in the Senate on the motion of a Senator from Kansas; but the law as it stands, other than that, was introduced by Senator Powell, of Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. The amendment is the only thing now under discussion. The amendment was the only question then. The Senator from Illinois sought to make the impression on the country as a distinguished gentleman from Ohio did elsewhere two weeks ago that this bill, this amendment, the placing soldiers at the polls, was done at the instance of the democracy and was voted for by the democracy; and they sought to impress on the country that we are revolutionary now in going back upon our own work and seeking to set aside our own measure when we were proposing to strike this clause out. I repeat that it is known to every intelligent man that the amendment, the only one we are now seeking to strike out, that which authorizes soldiers to be brought to the polls to keep the peace there, was inserted by Mr. Pomeroy, of Kansas, voted against by every democrat in the Senate, Governor Powell himself declaring that it would destroy the main object he had in view in the passage of the bill, and Mr. Willard Saulsbury, of Delaware, rising and indorsing his statement, saying that it was under that pretense all the mischief had been done in Delaware. Still, when they were voted down they accepted the bill as amended rather than allow elections to be held absolutely under military domination as they had been before that time. Now, after fourteen years of peace, with each State fully restored to all her proper relations to the Federal Government and her sister States, when we propose to repeal what was only inserted as a precautionary measure in time of war we are told that we are seeking to revolutionize the Government and deprive the President of his constitutional rights.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator, I hope, will at least do me the justice to say that I did not intimate it was revolutionary merely because of the fact that that bill was introduced either by a democrat or by a republican. That was not my ground at all. I merely alluded to that.

Mr. BECK. But what is revolutionary in the repeal of the clause we seek to repeal?

Mr. LOGAN. I did not use the remark that it was revolutionary because it was introduced by a democrat or by a republican.

Mr. BECK. Waive that. I now ask the question where is the revolution in our seeking to repeal it in a peaceable manner as a part of the Army bill when we are providing supplies for the Army under our authority?

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator ask me why it is?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir; what is there in the act of repeal that is revolutionary?

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will give me permission, I will state what there is that is revolutionary. It is because of the fact that you have acknowledged that you cannot pass the bill in any other way than by coercing a co-ordinate branch of this Government to the signing of the bill by putting it upon an appropriation that gives sustenance to the Government. Therefore it is in itself coercive, it is in itself force, it is in itself violative of the spirit of the Constitution, and hence it is revolutionary in itself. That is the reason for it.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I repeat that we have no information and no possibility of having any information that the President will refuse to sign this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wishes to interrupt the Senator for a moment. There have been several allusions made in this debate to what the President of the United States will do or what he will not do. It is perfectly competent for Senators to argue what the President ought to do or what he ought not to do; but it is not in order to say that the President will do or will not do a particular thing in regard to a measure pending in Congress.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon. I do not know that I have said what he will do, but I will say what he ought to do.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to say that I have made no reference whatever to what the President will do in any case. I have used no such language in any remarks I have made.

Mr. BECK. The Senator's language was that we could not pass the bill in any other way, and therefore we were seeking to coerce the President. Now, sir, we are doing what has been done a great many times, and before I am done I will prove it; and it was not considered revolutionary by the republican party then.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Kentucky, Mr. President, allow me to call his attention to his own language in the statement of what is revolutionary?

Mr. BECK. I would rather go on now. You have read that twice, I believe, [laughter,] and I have said that I thought that was the best part of your speech, at one time. [Laughter.]

I am a little out of the order in which I intended to go; but the Senator from Illinois will perhaps recollect the Army bill of March 2, 1867, where President Johnson was by the second section of it deprived of his constitutional powers as Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, and all the forces of the Government were required to report to General Ulysses S. Grant, whose headquarters were established in Washington, to interfere with whom was made an offense; and by the sixth section of that bill eleven States were ordered to disband their militia, and were not allowed to organize it except by the consent of Congress. Andrew Johnson sent in a message approving that bill, although it had in it all these things; and a great many of the gentlemen who are now here, the Senator from Maine conspicuously among them, voted for all these amendments to that Army bill; that looked a good deal more like coercion than anything I can see in this bill, and a good deal more like revolution; and I remember many of these gentlemen who are now speaking so flippantly about revolution are found recorded on the yeas and nays voting for that bill with those amendments putting all that pressure upon the President, and they succeeded in getting him to sign the bill.

Are we to learn nothing from experience? Are we to be throwing grass while you are throwing stones? Are we to strip off everything from the bill we propose that the republicans do not like merely because they do not like them, and let them raise the cry of revolution against us when we are only following their example, and that, too, in the very mildest possible way? And are we told that the people of Europe are looking in holy horror at the slanders we are circulating against that august party, and that we are degrading the country and disgracing American institutions by speaking in the way we are about the Government? Why, sir——

Mr LOGAN. The Senator will allow me right there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky submit to interruption?

Mr. LOGAN. I will try to state the distinction between this proposition and that which the Senator refers to.

Mr. BECK. I think ours is a much milder imitation of it.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to take the Senator's time, but if he will allow me——

Mr. BECK. I do not believe the Senator from Illinois could convince me. I have hardly begun what I had intended to say; I have been kept on the skirmish line so long by the able speech he made. I really did not intend to pay him any attention; I intended to answer, as best I could, the Senator from Maine who spoke yesterday, but the Senator from Illinois piled in so much to-day of all sorts that I am not progressing as rapidly as I should like to do.

Mr. LOGAN. I see your trouble.

Mr. BECK. Now I should be glad to be allowed to go on. There is one matter, not very important, that I should like the Senator from Maine to listen to; it occurs to me while waiting. Yesterday he was speaking about how southern men were taking possession of the Senate, and how the confederate gentlemen were here in such alarming force; he thought there was such danger to the Republic growing out of their presence here. I want to call his attention—though it is a little out of the line of my argument—to the time when he was a candidate for Speaker of the Forty-first Congress, on the 10th day of December, 1868, he made a very good speech in which he used this language:

> The election of 1868 is the last in which the lately rebellious section, even if it could be wholly controlled by rebels, will have sufficient power in the electoral vote of the country to make it the object either of hope or of fear on the part of political organizations striving for the government of the nation.

I think a change has come over the spirit of his dreams since he uttered that sentiment; he has more apprehension about what these gentlemen from the South are doing now than all the rest of his political troubles put together; and just here I may say that while he was complaining yesterday of the number of chairmanships and the recognition that was now given in the lower House to the men of the South, I sent for the record of some Congresses when he presided. I had the honor to serve under him when he was Speaker, and being a little amazed at his remarks in regard to what had been done by the present Speaker for the South, I turned to the Congressional Directory of the Forty-first Congress, when he was Speaker of the House, and I found that he distributed most of his patronage in one corner of the country, seemingly to carry out and sustain the great combinations that were then being sustained and perfected, such as banks, bonds, tariffs, &c. At the head of the Committee of Ways and Means in the Forty-first Congress was Mr. Hooper, of Massachusetts; of Appropriations, Mr. DAWES, of Massachusetts; of Claims, Mr. Washburn, of Massachusstts; of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Banks of Massachusetts; of Reconstruction, General Butler, of Massachusetts; Ways and Means, Appropriations, Claims, Foreign Affairs, all in one State, in one corner, and the reconstruction of the whole country put into the hands of that warm friend of the southern people, so that they could have fair play and justice done them, General Butler, of Massachusetts. [Laughter.] And from New England, the whole of it a little corner as compared with the whole, that has more than a million less people than the State of New York alone. Independent of these five great chairmanships, Commerce was given to Mr. Dixon, of Rhode Island; Revolutionary Pensions to Mr. Willard of Vermont; the Revision of the Laws to Mr. Poland, of Vermont; Patents to Mr. Jenckes, of Rhode Island; Expenditures of the Navy Department to Mr. Lynch, of Maine; Expenditures of the Interior Department to Mr. Ela, of New Hampshire; Rules to Mr. BLAINE, of Maine; Civil Service to Mr. Jenckes, of Rhode Island; American Shipping to Mr. Lynch, of Maine; the Library to Mr. Peters, of Maine—four Maine men I think out of five—and the Committee on Ventilation to Mr. Jenckes, of Rhode Island. I merely mention that to show that there is no particular cause of complaint on the score of comparison as to the action of the present Speaker of the House; at least the Senator from Maine ought not to complain of it.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator pardon me for one question? Will he be good enough to tell me, when those committees were announced, how many States of the southern confederacy had been restored to representation in Congress?

Mr. BECK. This was in 1871.

Mr. BLAINE. Eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, was it not? The Forty-first Congress met in 1869.

Mr. BECK. I think all but Texas, Virginia, and Mississippi were then represented.

Mr. BLAINE. When the Forty-first Congress was organized—of course, I can only put my memory against that of the honorable Senator—Tennessee was the only State represented; so that if I did injustice to the South it was because certain circumstances had kept them from being represented at that time.

Mr. BECK. I do not recollect distinctly. They were all in the Forty-second Congress, and we will come to that. In the Forty-second Congress, when all the States were in, Mr. DAWES, of Massachusetts, was chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means; Mr. Hooper, of Massachusetts, chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency; Mr. Banks, of Massachusetts, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs; Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts, chairman of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and Mr. Buffinton, of Massachusetts, chairman of the Committee of Accounts—five chairmanships to the State of Massachusetts alone two years after all the States were in. That, however, is, by the way, merely to show the Senator that he ought not to throw stones.

I was going on to say when I turned from this law of Mr. Powell, that so far from the democratic party having made the charges that are disgracing the republicans if they are disgraced, they have had these charges made against them by their own people in ways, and proof brought against them in forms, that I never attempted. I read what Mr. Evarts said after the invasion of Louisiana. I desire now to read what the late Senator, Hon. Stanley Matthews, of Ohio, said on the 1st day of May, 1872, when he was elected president of a convention then being held composed of the men who had been the republican leaders, of whom the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] was one, and which convention was participated in by such men as Mr. Trumbull, Mr. Sumner, Mr. Schurz, now Secretary of the Interior, and hundreds of others of the same distinguished character who could have held and who up to that time had held, many of them, the highest offices of honor, profit, and trust in the gift of the republican party. When we democrats are charged with making false accusations against republicans, perhaps it is well to read what their own leaders said. Mr. Stanley Matthews, president of that convention, among other things said:

And now, gentlemen, one of the deep and earnest convictions, which has spread universally almost through the hearts of the American people and out of which this movement originates, is this, that the war of the rebellion is ended—

That was seven years ago. You would think it was raging now, to hear the speeches of the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Illinois, and that there was danger of collision between the North and the South at any moment and it could hardly be averted but for their eloquence and their protests—that the war of the rebellion is ended and that peace has come, [applause,] and that, as the war has ended so ought military rule and military principles; [cries of "Good!" "Good!" and loud cheers;] so ought everything that is arbitrary; so ought everything that degrades race or individuals; so ought everything that oppresses, everything that corrupts, everything that keeps alive and fans the embers of the dying and ought to be dead past. The cry came up four years ago, and it was thought to be an auspicious omen, the coming of that time which we had looked for in vain, when it was said, "Let us have peace." Look at the South to-day. What a spectacle! We have the example of so-called civil governments bankrupting the communities they affect to represent; power usurped by strangers and not conferred by the voice of the people, and not for the purpose of restoring the prosperity of those battle-grazed fields, but for corruptly enriching the men who think that power and office belong to them as property and not as a trust. And so, gentlemen, in every department of the Government the slow poison of corruption, only not sufficiently slow, seems to have pervaded the whole civil and political administration of the country from the head to the foot. [Applause.]

Observe, that is the language of the late Senator from Ohio, then president of a convention of men who up to that time had been republicans, and who claimed that they were obliged to leave the republican party because of its military rule, because of its despotism, because of its disregard of the rights of States and people, because of its seeking to overthrow civil liberty, because of its consolidation, its centralization, and its despotic tendencies. They went further than that. They issued an address to the American people that no doubt was read all over Europe, if that is what Senators are afraid of, all over the world, and they said things in that address against the party which is now seeking to maintain military power, to keep the peace at the polls, in a manner more bitter than anything that any democrat ever said. That address I hold in my hand. It reads thus:

The administration now in power has rendered itself guilty of wanton disregard of the laws of the land, and of usurping powers not granted by the Constitution; it has acted as if the laws had binding force only for those who are governed, and not for those who govern. It has thus struck a blow at the fundamental principles of constitutional government and the liberties of the citizen.

Has any democrat ever said anything more than that? Have any of us said anything as bad? They proceed:

The President of the United States has openly used the powers and opportunities of his high office for the promotion of personal ends.

He has kept notoriously corrupt and unworthy men in places of power and responsibility, to the detriment of the public interest.

He has used the public service of the Government as a machinery of corruption and personal influence, and has interfered, with tyrannical arrogance, in the political affairs of States and municipalities.

Leaving out some matters merely personal to the President, the address proceeds:

The partisans of the Administration, assuming to be the republican party and controlling its organization, have attempted to justify such wrongs and palliate such abuses to the end of maintaining partisan ascendency.

They have stood in the way of necessary investigations and indispensable reforms, pretending that no serious fault could be found with the present administration of public affairs, thus seeking to blind the eyes of the people.

They have kept alive the passions and resentments of the late civil war to use them for their own advantage; they have resorted to arbitrary measures in direct conflict with the organic law, instead of appealing to the better instincts and latent patriotism of the southern people by restoring to them these rights, the enjoyment of which is indispensable to a successful administration of their local affairs and would tend to revive a patriotic and hopeful national feeling.

They have degraded themselves and the name of their party, once justly entitled to the confidence of the nation, by a base sycophancy to the dispenser of executive power and patronage unworthy of republican freemen; they have sought to silence the voice of just criticism and stifle the moral sense of the people, and to subjugate public opinion by tyrannical party discipline.

They are striving to maintain themselves in authority for selfish ends by an unscrupulous use of the power which rightfully belongs to the people, and should be employed only in the service of the country.

Believing that an organization thus led and controlled can no longer be of service to the best interests of the Republic, we have resolved to make an independent appeal to the sober judgment, conscience, and patriotism of the American people.

I repeat, therefore, Mr. President, that in view of what was said by that liberal republican convention in their address to the people of the country, in view of what was said by Mr. Evarts, in view of what was said by Mr. Matthews, in view of what has been said by their leading men, it does not lie in the mouth of any republican Senator here to say that the democratic party is seeking to disgrace the republican party before the country or the world when they are seeking simply to withdraw soldiers from the polls.

I desire now to take up another branch of the subject in reply to the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. VOORHEES. If the Senator from Kentucky will yield, I will make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BECK. I have got so far away from what I expected to say and there are so many things I desire to say that I will take less time of the Senate if I can get an adjournment to the morning and have time to arrange my thoughts than if I struggle along now.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will not the Senator yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. BECK. Certainly I will.

REFRIGERATING VESSEL FOR DISINFECTION.

Mr. GARLAND. Before the motion is put, I ask that the message from the House be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a Senate bill which has been returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 55) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the purchase or construction of a refrigerating ship for the disinfection of vessels and cargoes, and for other purposes, which was, in line 3, to strike out the words "machine or machines," and insert the word "machinery."

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House, and I will state that the amendment is merely a verbal one and really makes the bill better than it was when it went from the Senate, and in this the committee that reported the bill to the Senate concur. I ask the attention of the Senate for a moment to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty-three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

11. To the Committee on Enrolled Bills, a clerk.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, if there is no desire to discuss this matter (and I see no indication of it) I will call the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether the number of clerks authorized by this report exceeds the number employed in the last Congress?

Mr. HENRY. Including those who were appointed under the regular appropriation bill and those who were provided for by resolutions, the aggregate embraced in our report is one less than the whole number employed in the last Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. How about the rates of pay? Are they the same as in the last Congress?

Mr. HENRY. The rates of pay are fixed in the law——

The SPEAKER. The pay is established by statute.

Mr. HENRY. It is established by statute in regard to twenty-four of these clerks; and as to the others by resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was adopted.

Mr. HENRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REFRIGERATING SHIP FOR DISINFECTING PURPOSES.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. By direction of the Select Committee on the Origin, Introduction, and Prevention of Epidemic Diseases in the United States, I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for immediate consideration the bill (S. No. 55) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the construction of a refrigerating ship for the disinfection of vessels and cargoes, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized to contract for the purchase or construction of such steam-vessel and refrigerating machine or machines, or to arrange with the Navy Department for the use of such vessel, as may be recommended by the National Board of Health, to disinfect vessels and cargoes from ports suspected of infection with yellow fever or other contagious diseases, the construction of the same, if such construction shall be recommended by said board of health, to be under the inspection of an officer of the Bureau of Steam Engineering of the Navy, who may, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, be detailed by the Secretary of the Navy for that purpose; and for the purpose of such purchase or construction the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. CONGER. I think that this bill should be considered in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule. Without wishing to hinder the passage of the bill, but desirous to have some explanations with regard to it, I make the point of order that the bill should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Michigan will hear me a moment, I think he will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I am willing to reserve the point.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest that we might by common consent have the bill discussed in the House as in the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this bill will be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule.

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the whole subject of yellow fever is comparatively a mystery, and has baffled the scrutiny of the scientific world. When the proposition embodied in this bill was first brought to my attention I had very grave doubts whether the project warranted the expenditure; but upon more thorough investigation of the subject I have become satisfied that while this may be regarded in some sense as an experiment, it is one that at least ought to be made, in order that nothing may be left undone that will tend in any way to solve the mystery that surrounds this most terrible of all diseases that afflict the human family.

The proposition has been submitted to the National Board of Health, composed of gentlemen who stand very high as scientists and sanitarians, and after careful examination and consideration on their part, we are advised by them that if there is any certain specific for yellow fever, any means that can be absolutely relied upon for the destruction of the poisonous germ, that agency is cold. The gentleman who submitted the proposition originally is one of the foremost scientists of England, and who was recently engaged by this Government some years ago to investigate the cattle disease, a malady akin to yellow fever, and I believe his report on that subject has met the approval of every scientist in this country.

I am unable to explain scientifically, not being mechanic enough, the details and methods by which it is proposed to operate this freezing-vessel. It is proposed, however, to construct a vessel which will have the power within one hour to reduce the temperature of any sea-going vessel below the point at which mercury freezes, the whole rigging and every article about the vessel undergoing the same process. It is proposed to station it at the quarantine grounds off New Orleans, and when vessels approach that port from infected regions to apply this freezing process, and in that way to destroy the germ of yellow fever.

The necessity of enacting this bill into law at once consists in the fact that the time is rapidly approaching when we may expect another invasion of that plague in the Mississippi Valley coming from southern seaboard cities. It will take ninety days perhaps to build the vessel, and if the work is commenced at once it will hardly be done in time to meet the purpose for which it is designed.

I have heard it stated upon the floor and in conversation upon the street recently, that on a vessel sailing from Boston a short time since, which had been subjected to the natural freezing process, and which had been disinfected as far as they were able to disinfect it with all the agencies at their command, yellow fever developed in a short time after sailing from that port, but I have since learned from a letter which I have in my possession from an officer on board of that ship that the breaking out of the fever on that vessel was attributable perhaps to the fact that fire was kept burning in it nearly all the winter and that all its timbers were in a decaying condition. So I do not think this was a fair test of the freezing theory. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING] to read the letter I have referred to.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire, in order that there may be full information on this question, as the gentleman has referred to the case of the United States steamer Plymouth, to send up the official report of the Surgeon-General of the United States Marine Hospital Service, and to ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Surgeon-General of the United States Navy has furnished the following facts in regard to the recent outbreak of yellow fever on the United States steamer Plymouth: On November 7, last, four cases of yellow fever occurred on board the vessel while lying in the harbor of Santa Cruz; these were removed to hospital on shore and the ship sailed for Norfolk. Three mild cases occurred during the voyage, and the Plymouth was ordered to Portsmouth, New Hampshire, thence to Boston. At the latter port everything was removed from the ship and all parts of the interior freely exposed to a temperature which frequently fell below zero, the exposure continuing for more than a month. During this time the water in the tanks, bilges, and in vessels placed in the store-rooms was frozen. One hundred pounds of sulphur was burned below decks, this fumigation continuing for two days; and the berth-decks, holds, and store-rooms were thoroughly whitewashed. On March 15 the ship sailed from Boston southward; on the 19th, during a severe gale, the hatches had to be battened down and the berth-deck became very close and damp. On the 23d two men showed decided symptoms of yellow fever, and on the recommendation of the surgeon the vessel was headed northward. The sick men were isolated and measures adopted for improving the hygienic condition of the vessel and crew. The surgeon reported that he believed the infection to be confined to the hull of the ship, especially to the unsound wood about the berth-deck, all the cases but one having occurred within a limited area; and that while the Plymouth is in good sanitary condition for service in temperate climes, should she be sent to a tropical station probably no precautionary measures whatever would avail to prevent an outbreak of yellow fever.

J. B. HAMILTON,
Surgeon-General U. S. Marine Hospital Service.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not present that, Mr. Speaker, in opposition to the bill, but simply in order that the whole information may be before the House. I understand the gentleman from Louisiana has a letter which will qualify some of the statements just read.

Mr. KING. I have a private letter from an officer on board the United States steamship Plymouth, an extract of which I will read for the information of the House:

This ship was thoroughly frozen out while lying at the navy-yard at Boston and fumigated by burning large quantities of sulphur; but because this was done I do not think those remedies are proved valueless. The whole gist of the matter, to my view, lies in the fact of the presence of a large quantity of rotten wood inside of the ship, which, being porous, absorbed in a most effectual manner the infectious element.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the writer of that letter is an officer on board the United States steamship Plymouth. It is, of course, a private letter. I have received in addition, a few days ago, a letter from the president of the board of health of the city of New Orleans urging that something be done if possible to keep off the introduction of yellow fever into that city during the coming season. He suggests this House of Representatives take into consideration the appropriation of a sufficient sum of money to allow this freezing apparatus to be placed at the quarantine station at the mouth of the Mississippi. Gentlemen who have witnessed the ravages of yellow fever can only appreciate the necessity which is felt in that portion of the country of keeping out an enemy so subtle and so destructive. We know that during the hot weather that disease spreads and carries devastation with it on all hands. We know that on the first day of frost a shout of relief goes up, quarantine is broken, and commerce once more begins to flow in its usual channel; and we know also that with the announcement in spring-time of the approach of the yellow fever terror is at once depicted in the countenances of the inhabitants of that part of the country. On the application of the board of health of the city of New Orleans I therefore urge this House to take into earnest consideration measures to prevent the introduction of this enemy into our midst again. They approve of this freezing process.

It may be suggested that this is experimental; but it is in the right direction. The question is, how far will this Government exert its power for the protection of its citizens against this terrible disease? Millions are spent in the destruction of men. Is it not time that by the authority of a civilized people, thus represented, thousands at least should be spent for the protection and preservation of human life and happiness? As I have stated, this proposition, involving an expenditure of money insignificant when compared with the magnitude of the interests at stake, is urged by the board of health at the city of New Orleans. It also has the indorsement of the National Board of Health appointed by this Government. On this high authority I hope this House will decide.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer an amendment as a matter of detail, which I think the gentleman will accept, and that is to strike out the words "machine" or "machines" wherever they occur, and to insert in lieu thereof the word "machinery." And I do that for the reason that we ought not to allow too large a range of experiment, for whatever is done on this subject ought to be done with the utmost dispatch. If the Board of Health is permitted to invite all sorts of proposals for all sorts of machines, as the plural word seems to give them an opportunity to make such invitation, it may delay any effective action in this matter. I think we ought, therefore, to strike out those words and just put in "machinery;" so that they will have to prepare a ship with what they consider the requisite machinery. We thus put the responsibility upon them and shut them up to the one thing of having the one ship, with its outfit, for one purpose.

I certainly concur in the amendment that the Senate made to the original bill striking out the name of any person. We ought not to legislate for contracts made with any one man by name. We ought to put the responsibility properly on the Board of Health and the Secretary of the Treasury, as this bill does.

While I am up I will say that I do not know enough about the power or the efficacy of this proposed mode of refrigeration to be sure that it will be effective; but I resolve all doubts upon that subject in favor of the utmost we can do to try it, and if we can even be effective half-way in the disinfection of the merchant marine of the United States we ought to do it at any reasonable cost. I believe we shall have the great satisfaction of seeing a unanimous vote in this House; and it is all the more gratifying to me that in a time of a great deal of party feeling we can strike a truce and join together as one man on a great measure like this that has no section, no party in it; but wherever human hearts are and human lives are, within the borders of our whole country or in vessels on the sea which are under our control, the American Congress is as one, I believe, on that subject. And I make the suggestion of this amendment in the interests of rapid action and unity of action. I would not offer even this if I did not suppose and believe that the gentleman in charge of the bill would accept it.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. GIBSON. I rise, Mr. Speaker, merely to express my gratification at the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and to say one word in favor of the pending bill. I confess we know as yet little or nothing of the causes, causa causans of yellow fever. We have hypotheses, but no well-sustained theory. But we know something of this disease historically. We know it to be a specific disease, different from any other. We know that it never appears in an epidemic form, never has appeared in any part of our country during the winter season. We know that it is a child of the tropics and becomes a monster of destruction only when our own climate in the summer season is tropical.

I am quite sure I am justified in saying that the weight of testimony taken by the committees of the last Congress was altogether in favor of the foreign origin of this disease, and of its importation by vehicles of commerce into our country. I admit, sir, that the pending bill, applying a refrigerating process to all ships coming from countries afflicted with yellow fever, is an experiment, but it is an experiment commended to us by the highest authorities. The method is recommended by the board of health of Louisiana—a board of scientific and able men, at the head of which stands Dr. Samuel Choppin, who for learning, energy, and devotion to duty has no superior in this country. It is commended to us by the National Board of Health, the members of which were selected by the President of the United States for their professional attainments. It is commended to us by our own knowledge of the disease itself; for whether we can establish the relation of cause and effect between intense heat and yellow fever or not, we know positively that intense cold will suppress, will destroy it.

Why should we not make this experiment? Should it fail, the sum lost is small; but should it succeed, countless millions will be saved and the sum of human happiness vastly increased.

Sir, I never think of the recent epidemic without recalling the splendid generosity of our countrymen of the North. I hope this bill will pass by a unanimous vote, notwithstanding the opposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] The people of the section I in part represent will not forget the generous bearing and broad patriotism of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. COX. The gentleman who has charge of this bill had some doubt about it. The gentleman from Ohio had some doubt about it. It is only an experiment with $200,000. I do not think it is a speculation, but I think this matter ought to be referred back to the committee with a view to making something else than a mere tentative movement. Dr. Vanderpool, our board of health officer in New York, does not approve of it. The very letter read by my friend from Massachusetts shows, with all the fumigation with sulphur and what not, the yellow fever was still left in one of our own vessels in midwinter.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Let me say to the gentleman that Dr. Vanderpool was at the meeting of the board of health when they considered that bill.

Mr. COX. He has published a pamphlet—I do not think it is a public pamphlet—of which I have a copy, and I am sorry I do not have it here. He does not approve of these experiments. He has preserved New York beyond what has been done by any surgeon, or physician, or health officer we ever had.

Mr. ATKINS. Does he refer to this particular experiment?

Mr. COX. Yes; he refers to the experiment of freezing out yellow fever by means of a refrigerating ship.

Now, it is very unpleasant to oppose a bill of this nature, and perhaps I had better sit down, [laughter;] but I shall vote against it.

Mr. GOODE. I am glad my friend from New York has taken a sober second thought and concluded to sit down. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, this bill will meet with no other opposition; I hope so, at least. What is it, sir? The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the purchase or construction of a steam-vessel with refrigerating apparatus attached, or it authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to arrange with the Secretary of the Navy for a suitable vessel to be used for disinfecting purposes. The construction of the vessel, if the construction is authorized, is to be under the supervision and inspection of an officer in the steam-engineering bureau of the Department. My friend from New York says it is an experiment. It is true it is an experiment. But if we fail, the scientific knowledge obtained on this subject would be valuable to everybody, and if it should prove a success it would be impossible to calculate the beneficial results that would accrue.

Now it has been said here that this proposition is indorsed by the National Board of Health, a board selected by the President; a board composed of the most eminent sanitarians in this country; and not only indorsed by the Board of Health, but it has the approval of the most eminent scientific men in the land. The whole bill proceeds upon the basis that the yellow fever is an exotic brought to this country from tropical climates in the holds of vessels, and the germs from which it is propagated may be effectually frozen out and destroyed by the refrigerating process; in other words, it is now a generally conceded fact that the yellow fever cannot live in a freezing temperature, and as my friend from Louisiana [Mr. KING] has just remarked, so well is this fact known in the South that the good people in the churches always pray for frost, and when frost appears there is a shout of joy throughout the fever-stricken localities.

I trust that the bill will be passed unanimously. I believe that there is nothing in the experience on board the Plymouth that militates against it. You have heard the letter read against the theory, and more than that you have here the report of the Secretary of the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy does not report against it. We are told that the yellow fever broke out on board the Plymouth in the same place where it occurred before; but in the opinion of the medical officers that was due to the rotten timbers forming a part of the deck.

Now it seems to me that we ought to try this experiment. It is nothing more than an experiment. I have no opinion on the subject, and like my friend from Tennessee I have no opinion as to the practicability of it. If I had an opinion it would be worth nothing. Most of the eminent sanitarians of the land approve of it and the Board of Health ask for it. Everybody seems desirous that the experiment shall be made, and I hope the bill will be passed unanimously.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope that this bill will meet the approval of the House, and I think one matter of fact should be stated to the House for its consideration. This is a bill which comes from the Senate, where the matter has undergone investigation both in the committee and in the body of the Senate. While this discussion has been going on I took occasion to write a brief note to my friend, Senator GARLAND, who belongs to the Senate committee, to ascertain what were the circumstances under which this bill passed in the Senate, and he says in reply that after the bill had been amended in the manner suggested it passed without a single dissenting vote. It has been said by my gentle friend from New York [Mr. COX] that this is but an experiment. It is true that it is an experiment, but it is an experiment in the line of that only preventive which nature seems to have suggested for this disease prevailing in tropical countries, namely, the recurrence of cold weather.

Experience has demonstrated that whenever we have a degree of cold reaching freezing point the disease disappears. It is true that in the case of the steamer Plymouth, which underwent fumigation and the freezing process, and finally had the disease appear again, it failed. That is just what was said by one of the most distinguished physicians that we examined before the committee in New Orleans, and he electrified the subcommittee with his thorough and perfect knowledge of this disease. I refer to Dr. J. Dickson Bruns, of New Orleans, who spoke on this subject before the committee on the very day when the singular spectacle was presented of icicles as long as my arm pendent from the portico of the St. Charles Hotel and other buildings in the city of New Orleans. The question was propounded to him: "Are you of opinion that a degree of cold like that now prevailing in New Orleans would kill the disease and prevent it?" His reply was: "Yes; except you must make allowance for the fact that in cold weather our houses are heated, and we cannot allow the cold to penetrate into the interior of our buildings."

This process I understand proposes to imitate the example of the health board of New York and the distinguished physicians who have had charge of its conduct for so many years.

Mr. GIBSON. Has the gentleman any information as to the fact whether the sailors of the Plymouth remained upon that ship while she was in the port of Boston with their fires and their blankets?

Mr. HOOKER. I understand that that was the case.

I do not believe that from the reappearance of the disease there the experiment was a fair test of the refrigerating process which this bill proposes to apply to vessels coming from infected ports. Then we propose to try this experiment with nature's great teachings as our example. We are, in other words, endeavoring to do for every vessel that comes into our ports from an infected region that which nature does where her laws do not interfere with any of the comforts, conveniences, and necessities of man, and I say that experience has demonstrated that wherever a certain amount of cold is reached, there we believe the disease, though decimating by thousands, will be disposed of, and general health prevail in the cities.

It is said that this is an experiment. I say it is an experiment in the right direction. I know nothing of the particular individual who may be engaged to carry out this experiment, but the sum of money proposed to be expended for that purpose is a mere bagatelle in comparison to the benefit to the human race in that region of country, with which all the rest of our common country is so intimately connected. By such a process as this, if successful, you not only save human life, but you protect that commerce which flows into our southern ports from South America, and enable them there to have an effectual system of quarantine by means of this process of refrigeration.

When my friend from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] propounded a question to me, I was alluding to the fact that in the port of New York they have had a system of quarantine with reference to the fumigation and cleansing of vessels more thorough than has been established in any other port of the United States. Hence they have been for more than a century protected from the ravages of this fell disease. I hope this bill will pass without opposition.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. As a member of the committee which has examined with some care the measure provided by the bill under consideration I wish to say but a word. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] urges that this proposition is merely an experiment. In some sense any plan of quarantine, and especially any plan to keep out of the country a terrible epidemic, is an experiment. But these basis-facts are established: first, that yellow fever is not a native of this country, but is an exotic brought to us from tropic climates under certain conditions, one of which is heat; second, it is well established that cold is the destroyer, the antidote, of yellow fever. This has been well settled since this disease prevailed first in America. Nearly one hundred years ago Dr. Rush connected its prevalence with hot weather and its disappearance with cold.

This proposition is to use a refrigerating ship to freeze out and purify vessels coming into our ports, as recommended by the National Board of Health.

So far as the case of the United States steamer Plymouth furnishes any evidence against this plan, the facts are quite indefinite as a full and fair test. I have what I deem reliable informatiom that the "freezing out" of that vessel in the port of Boston was not thorough. It is stated too, upon the authority of some of the officers of that vessel, that the disease broke out in that part of the vessel which was formed of partly decayed wood, in which doubtless the germs of the disease were preserved.

Now, this measure is in the direction of all the known facts as to the nature, prevalence, and prevention of this fearful disease. The amount asked for by this bill is small indeed compared with the great good it may do. During the prevalence of yellow fever in the United States last summer, it is variously estimated that from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 was lost in trade and property by the people of this country, and that more than $15,000,000 loss was sustained by the city of New Orleans alone. But no arithmetic can measure the suffering, the sorrow, the loss of life, the desolated homes in the path of this destroyer. We all remember how millions of money were freely sent to the suffering regions from the awakened sympathies of the whole land. And now I trust there will be a unanimous vote of this House to do what we may to check the prevalence and ravages of this terrible epidemic in this country.

Mr. Speaker, millions and millions of dollars are spent every year for war and for war vessels and for the varied appliances for destroying human life. I trust that this Congress, in the spirit of a higher patriotism, will be willing to set apart a small sum for the preservation of the lives of the people of this country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FORT. I desire but a moment or two. I am not a scientist; I know nothing about yellow fever or other epidemics. I have become acquainted with the distinguished gentleman, Professor Gamgee, who has recommended this process of refrigeration for the prevention and destruction of yellow fever. To some extent he has explained the process to me, and I have a great deal of faith in his judgment. I hope this bill will pass, and pass by the unanimous vote of this House.

It has been said that the ship Plymouth, of the United States Navy, was frozen up in Boston Harbor during the last winter, and that since then the yellow fever has broken out on that ship. Now, even though the poisonous and subtle germs of this disease may not have been kept alive on board that ship, or in the rotten wood of the ship, is it not quite probable that the sailors who, we are told, were removed from the ship with their effects, took their chests, blankets, and clothing to some house where they were kept warm and not frozen all winter, and when they returned to the ship carried back the dormant germs of the disease, which, when warmed into life, broke out again into the yellow fever? May it not be the fact that the ship itself was thoroughly frozen, but the clothing of these sailors may not have been frozen? It may be that this was the reason why the yellow fever broke out again on that ship. I think this experiment is worth the money it is to cost, and I hope every member of this House will vote for this bill.

Mr. CONGER. But a few words——

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I desire to interrupt the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to say that, as the morning hour will soon expire, I propose to call the previous question when he has concluded his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is recognized as entitled to the floor for five minutes. At the conclusion of that time there will remain three minutes of the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. The almost universal feeling in every State in the Union, North and South, during the last year, prompting our citizens everywhere to do all they could, to contribute all they could, for the relief of those who were suffering from yellow fever in the South, would be a sufficient guarantee, I think, to every member of this House that he was expressing the sentiments of his own constituents by voting any reasonable appropriation for the purpose of making almost any reasonable experiment that might tend to check the ravages in our land of so fearful a pestilence.

For this reason I do not oppose this proposition, although I have no great faith in it. For this reason I am willing and desirous that this bill may be passed and this experiment tried. Although it may be effectual to some extent in temporarily checking the spread of yellow fever on vessels, although it may somewhat counteract the spread of the pestilence, I think the experience in the case of the steamer Plymouth, as detailed in this report from the Secretary of the Navy, should call for a more minute and critical investigation on this subject by the committee of this House, and especially by those engaged in inquiries in regard to this subject throughout the country.

I have been forcibly struck with the thoroughness and completeness of the measures reported by the captain of the Plymouth as having been taken to freeze that vessel, a war vessel on which the yellow fever had broken out, and whose captain on that account assumed the responsibility of disregarding the commands of the Government, changing his course and returning to the North. The captain of that vessel, Captain Harmony, leaves no doubt in his report about the absolute thoroughness of the freezing and fumigation of this vessel. Whether this new method can go beyond the natural force of freezing I am unable to say. The captain says:

> While in Boston every means known to sanitary science had been used to disinfect the ship of the germs of yellow fever. She was entirely broken out, all stores of any kind landed and placed in rooms exposed to a freezing temperature—> the ship thoroughly fumigated several times by burning large quantities of sulphur at different times on berth-deck, store-rooms, and in officers' apartments.

Can it be that the clothing of the sailors was not thus exposed?—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CONGER. Of course I surrender the floor; but it seems to me scarcely possible that I can have occupied five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels confident that he has made no mistake in measuring the gentleman's time. The reason the Chair must be prompt is because the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] has intimated his desire to call the previous question before the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. I had hoped to have an opportunity to express my views on this subject. At the request of gentlemen interested in this measure, I withdrew my point of order; and this is the happy result to myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had no power to extend the gentleman's time beyond five minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I make no complaint of the Chair. I only say that this is one of those unfortunate things that happen when I am inclined to be indulgent to my friends on the other side of the House who complain of me so much.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The gentleman is one of the cleverest men in the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] yield?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Not unless there can be unanimous consent for the extension of the time, in which case I shall have no objection.

Mr. LORING. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LORING] will be recognized for one minute.

Mr. FORT. I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes by unanimous consent.

Mr. COX. I hope there will be full debate on this matter.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. If the extension of time does not interfere with my right to call the previous question, I have no objection; otherwise I must insist on the call.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that he might call the previous question and after the call is seconded he might then yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will then have no time to yield.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is not this the report of a committee, and would not the gentleman be entitled to a closing hour?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has heretofore decided that where a report is made from a committee and the gentleman making the report occupies his hour, he has no right to claim another hour immediately afterward; that is, he cannot claim two consecutive hours.

Mr. WHITE. I ask that the time for discussion be extended ten minutes by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARFIELD. At the end of which time the previous question shall be considered as operating.

The SPEAKER. The effect of that arrangement will be to extend the morning hour for ten minutes, because the bill is in the morning hour. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Of these additional ten minutes the Chair will award five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] and five to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LORING.]

Mr. CONGER. It has been publicly stated that the fires were kept up on board this vessel and that the sailors remained upon her. I think it important, therefore, that I should call attention to the facts as stated in the official report of Captain Harmony:

All fires were extinguished and the vessel exposed to the severe temperature of the past winter for over six weeks. Part of the time the ship was in dry-dock, where large quantities of ice remained, and the temperature frequently reached a point below zero. The water in the tanks and in buckets placed in the store-rooms was constantly frozen during that time, and even after the ship was taken out of dock and fires had been lighted under one of the boilers to heat the ship she was so thoroughly chilled for several days that water froze in the bilges. All the men in the crew who showed any signs of weak constitutions or of being susceptible to climatic influences were sent to the hospital, and we had every reason to believe the ship was in a condition to resist anything like a renewal of the disease (yellow fever) which brought her home last November.

This officer says further:

This breaking out of the fever in the open ocean with a temperature of very little above seventy degrees I regard as a most remarkable circumstance, especially after the thorough freezing the ship went through while in Boston Harbor. The health officer at Bermuda, an English surgeon, told me of two cases of their own men-of-war which had similar experience. Both of them were affected with fever, were sent to Halifax, spent the whole winter there, and in the spring went south. On their arrival in the latitude but a few degrees below Bermuda, the fever broke out on board of them and they were taken north again, and eventually went to England without serving out their commission.

Now we may as well know the facts. If freezing will destroy the germs of yellow fever, it seems to me that the case of the Plymouth should have demonstrated that fact. If the seeds of the disease may linger in rotten wood, may they not do so during the process of freezing by injecting cold air from one vessel into the ship infected?

I have said that I am willing to vote for this bill, although I do believe that it is more a job than anything else that has been presented to this House for a year past. But in the interest of humanity, in seconding the endeavor to check the spread of a horrible pestilence, I agree with my friends here that we should not be sparing of means, but should try any and every experiment which may promise to stay the pestilence that walketh at noonday in our land.

Mr. LORING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word on this question, not because I think it necessary to convince the House of the importance of the bill, but because I wish to bear my testimony to the value of all such endeavors and experiments to suppress contagious and infectious disease in this land. There are certain facts, Mr. Speaker, known with regard to the control of yellow fever about which there can be no doubt, and one is that frost and cold will kill it. The experiment tried on board the Plymouth furnishes no exception to the rule, and the accidents which befell it then cast no reflections upon it. I consider it, therefore, fixed and established that diseases of this sort can be controlled by proper application of cold. So much for acknowledged facts.

Now, sir, in this age of experiment, moreover, is it not the duty of the Government to institute all proper experiments for the control and suppression of ravages of this description? Why, it is manifestly so. The whole history of science shows us that it is the duty of the Government to encourage scientific investigations for the suppression of destructive contagious and infectious diseases. In all its operations science has gone on, in our day, proving that man has in his hand the power to control those diseases in the animal and vegetable kingdom which are injurious to the community and destructive to life.

Why, sir, one of the most important questions submitted to the scientific investigation of our day is whether the "pestilence which walketh in darkness" can not be so controlled by confining it to the limits where it appears as to destroy it there and prevent its spreading to other localities. There have been certain curious investigations in the scientific world to prove that this can be done.

Every scientific investigator in matters pertaining to agriculture knows that in that widespread and important industry it has been found that man can contend against the insect tribes that are injurious to vegetation by antagonistic and parasitic insects, so that the ravage of our fields may be stayed as readily and as surely as the flood can be stayed by a sufficient obstacle placed in its way. In 1876 the silk industry of France was threatened with entire destruction. Millions of dollars in value were destroyed and thousands and thousands of persons were thrown out of employment by the destruction of the silk-worm in that country. It was found that a disease had attacked the silk-worm there which threatened to destroy that great silk industry entirely. In this emergency not mere empirical trials but scientific experiments were called into operation, and M. Pasteur, whose name has become immortal in the world of science, discovered that this disease could be eradicated by assailing it with an antagonistic one, which destroyed the disease itself. The disease was known by the euphonious name of panhistophyton, (who can doubt that a disease with such a name would be fatal to silk-worm or any other form of animal life?) [laughter,] and Pasteur discovered that it was a parasite within the body of the silk-worm, found in the digestive organs, found also in the eggs—an independent form of life, thoroughly organized, and destructive to the last degree. Devoting himself to the investigation until he wore himself out in the great scientific experiment, he discovered that the panhistophyton had an enemy in the world, and he let that enemy loose upon him. The silk industry of France was saved, and the law of nature was discovered that disease has its fatal antagonisms, and the law of man that those antagonisms can be controlled and applied to a useful purpose. This experiment has not been forgotten, and we are encouraged to believe that ere long a remedy for the most dangerous and destructive diseases will be found in the destruction of its germs. The government of France employed M. Pasteur in his important service, and made large and liberal appropriations of money to carry it on, feeling that it was an imperative duty to relieve the people from the great calamity which had fallen upon them, and that money should not be spared in saving a vast industry from destruction.

Shall the Congress of the United States, then, with this example before it, hesitate for one moment over an appropriation of $200,000 to put the scientific men of this land in funds to control that disease which destroyed so many lives last season, and which, sir, brought the hearts of Americans together in that hour of trial as nothing else has done during this century?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I demand the previous question.

Mr. COX. I have moved to lay the bill upon the table, but I will not insist upon that, only asking my friend from Tennessee to let me move to send this back to the committee to report a better bill. All, I have no doubt, will regret this action.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. GARFIELD'S amendment; which was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that in the absence of the Vice-President the Senate had chosen Hon. ALLEN G. THURMAN, a Senator from the State of Ohio, President of the Senate pro tempore.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 17) authorizing the printing of a portrait of the late Joseph Henry, to accompany the memorial volume heretofore ordered; when the Speaker signed the same.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

The SPEAKER. Yesterday leave was asked for the withdrawal of certain papers and at the instance of the gentleman from Michigan those requests were to be inserted in the RECORD this morning to see whether there should be any objection to any of them. The Chair has not heard so far any objection.

Mr. CONGER. I have examined what I wished in regard to those requests and have no further objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair therefore announces that the requests made yesterday are granted, no objection being made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] rises to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution relating to the organization of the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I yield to my colleague for that purpose.

STATIONERY.

Mr. BRIGHT. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to use any unexpended money belonging to the stationery fund, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purchase of needed articles of stationery, and to supply the committees in this House, under the direction of the Committee of Accounts, such stationery as they may need.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

Mr. BRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to call up again, at the request of many members, the resolution in relation to the distribution of documents. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the undistributed books and documents now remaining in the folding-room of the House of Representatives to the credit of members and officers of the last House of Representatives be placed to the credit of the corresponding members and officers of the present House, except one book or document of each kind, which shall be subject to the order of members of the last House.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have got through with this, and shall not present the resolution again.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CHALMERS. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHALMERS. I send to the desk a paper, which I ask the Clerk to read, accompanied by a resolution which I desire to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Cincinnati Gazette, April 10, 1879.]

THE HERO OF FORT PILLOW—A CHAPTER FROM THE HISTORY OF A DEMOCRATIC LEADER IN CONGRESS.

General CHALMERS, of Mississippi, in the House, on Tuesday last, made an insolent speech.

Who is this General CHALMERS? He is one of the notorious and bloody-handed butchers of the forever infamous Fort Pillow massacre. The facts as to this massacre were investigated by a joint committee of Congress, and the following is an extract from the report of Senator Ben Wade and Representative Gooch. After describing the attack on the fort, and its capture by treachery under a flag of truce, the report says:

"Then followed a scene of cruelty and murder without a parallel in civilized warfare, which wanted but the tomahawk and scalping-knife to exceed the worst atrocities ever committed by savages. The rebels committed an indiscriminate slaughter, sparing neither age nor sex, white or black, soldier or civilian. The officers and men seemed to vie with each other in the devilish work; men, women, and even children, wherever found, were deliberately shot down, beaten, and hacked with sabers; some of the children not more than ten years old were forced to stand up and face their murderers while being shot; the sick and wounded were butchered without mercy; and the rebels even entering the hospital building and dragging them out to be shot, or killing them as they lay there, unable to oppose the least resistance. * * * No cruelty which the most fiendish malignity could devise was omitted by these murderers. One white soldier, who was wounded in one leg so as to be unable to walk, was made to stand up while his tormentors shot him. One negro, who had been ordered by a rebel officer to hold his horse, was killed by him when he remonstrated; another, a mere child, whom an officer had taken up behind him on his horse, was seen by CHALMERS, who at once ordered the officer to put him down and shoot him, which was done. * * * One man was deliberately fastened down to the floor of a tent, face upward, by nails driven through his clothing and into the boards under him, so that he could not possibly escape, and then the tent was set on fire. Another was nailed to the side of a building outside the fort, and then the building set on fire and burned."

The report is sustained by many pages of testimony of officers and soldiers, who were eye-witnesses to the terrible atrocities. In the testimony of Major-General Stephen A. Hurlbut, (page 67, report of the Committee on the Conduct of the War, Fort Pillow Massacre, Thirty-eighth Congress, first session,) we find this allusion to General CHALMERS:

"Forrest was there personally. I understand, however, that the main body of the command was CHALMERS'S command, who was also there."

Page 51, John T. Ray, Thirteenth Tennessee Cavalry, testifies:

"I saw a rebel lieutenant take a little negro boy upon the horse behind him, and then I heard General CHALMERS—I think it must have been—tell him to 'take that 'negro down and shoot him,' or 'take him and shoot him,' and he passed him down and shot him.

"Question. How large was the boy?

"Answer. He was not more than eight years old. I heard the lieutenant tell the other that the negro was not in the service; that he was nothing but a child; that he was pressed and brought in there. The other said, 'Damn the difference, take him down and shoot him, or he would shoot him.' I think it must have been General CHALMERS. He was a smallish man; he had on a long gray coat, with a star on the coat."

[Cincinnati Enquirer, April 6, 1879.]

MAJOR BEN. BUTTERWORTH.

When Governor YOUNG concluded and withdrew to the rear of the stage, the band struck up "marching through Georgia." Then Major BEN. BUTTERWORTH came forward, and was greeted with a round of deafening applause. He said:

* * * * * * *

"I heard the hero of Fort Pillow, General CHALMERS, stand up in the Halls of the National Capitol and denounce you, fellow-citizens of the North, as traitors and enemies of the country."

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of seven shall be selected by the Speaker, all of whom shall be members who were officers of the Union Army during the civil war, and a majority of whom shall not belong to the democratic party.

That said committee shall examine into all charges made in House Report No. 65 of the first session of the Thirty-eighth Congress touching the conduct of J. R. CHALMERS, of Mississippi, then a brigadier-general of the confederate army, and now a member of this House, and report whether the same be true or not; and if the specific charges made are not true, whether said CHALMERS was guilty of any other conduct at or during the battle of Fort Pillow unbecoming an officer and a gentleman and which would render him unworthy to be a member of this House.

That said committee have power to send for persons and papers and employ necessary clerks and stenographers, and have leave to sit during the recess of Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before the gentleman from Mississippi proceeds I desire to reserve the point of order on the resolution. Of course I make no point of order on the personal explanation.

Mr. CHALMERS. This House has the right to judge not only of the election but of the qualification of its members. And, sir, if one-half the charges made against me are true, I am a murderer and am unfit to be an associate of the gentlemen who are members of this House. My election under such circumstances is a disgrace to the State of Mississippi, my presence here a stain upon the American Congress. This report was made during the midst of the war. It was founded upon ex parte statements of witnesses, most of whom were ignorant, and not one of whom professed to know me personally; the only witness who undertakes to identify me describes me as wearing a star upon my coat. Sir, that was the witness who described the pretended shooting of the child. No such transaction occurred. But if it were true that any confederate officer had been guilty of so foul a deed the testimony of this witness would exonerate me; for the star upon the coat was the mark of a major and not of a general in the confederate army.

Sir, all these charges were fully answered in the history of Forrest and his cavalry; and when they were renewed against me in 1876 they were again refuted by the testimony of living witnesses. The charges were renewed when I took my seat in this House by the partisan press of this country. I did not then notice them because the charges were so shocking to humanity, so incredible in my judgment, and had been so fully denied, that I did not believe there was a respectable gentleman in the country who could give any further credence to them. And I am happy to say, sir, after two years' service as a member of the Forty-fifth Congress, not one member of that body has ever, by word, action, or insinuation, in public or private, intimated that he believed me to be the monster of cruelty who was described in that report.

The charges have recently been renewed in the press, and a member of this House from the State of Ohio, [Mr. BUTTERWORTH,] in a speech recently made in Cincinnati, has connected my name with the battle of Fort Pillow in a manner to indicate that he believed I was guilty of these charges.

Mr. Speaker, I have no words of bitterness for any gentleman who has thus unjustly accused me. While these charges stand upon the records of the country, reported by a congressional committee, I can only say that they are perhaps excusable. But that, sir, is a greater reason why the investigation I ask for should be granted and the truth of history should be vindicated. It is due to me as a Representative; it is due to my State; it is due to the people of my district; it is due to the party with whom I am associated; and, above all, it is due to the honor of American soldiers, and due to the fame of this House of Representatives. I ask, therefore, that the resolution may be adopted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the resolution is before the House.

Mr. BUCKNER. I rise to a point of order. I suggest that this is a question that does not come within the rule adopted by the Chair in the case of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ACKLEN.] That was a question, as the Chair supposed, affecting his character as an individual, and the Chair held then that it was not a question of privilege.

Now, this is a question as to the history of this country, and I submit whether it is a question of privilege and ought to be acted upon in the form in which it now stands.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the matter should affect a gentleman in his representative capacity; but the Chair, in this instance, so far as he is able to gather, is of opinion that there is a connection with the representative character of the gentleman from Mississippi. This is a comment upon a speech made upon this floor by the gentleman. The Chair, however, is not willing to make any decision on that subject, and hence he asked unanimous consent, which the House has given, and the resolution is before the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I reserved for a moment a point of order upon the resolution.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair looked to the gentleman to see whether he insisted upon the point of order, but he did not.

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir; I waived it. I did not raise the objection a second time, but I want to ask the attention of the House for a moment, not at all to the merits of the controversy raised by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS,] but to the principle upon which the House ought to go in regard to requests for investigations as to personal character.

Of course everybody admits that where a man's representative and official character is assailed, it becomes the business of the body to which he belongs. Where an assault, whether justifiable or unjustifiable, is made upon his personal character, independent of his official character, unconnected with the performance of his official duties, and particularly as to matters outside of his official duties both in time and place, it is a very important question for us to inquire how far we ought to go in recognizing in the form of an investigation that class of charges.

The Chair and the House will remember that last session the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ACKLEN] appealed to the House to grant him an investigation into matters touching his personal character, an assault upon his personal reputation, and the point was made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and some others upon both sides of the House that it did not come properly within the purview of the House of Representatives to enter on a discussion and examination of that class of charges.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will recollect that the Chair submitted that question to the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is true, and I refer to it as a decision of the House upon the subject. I think the House decided rightly in that case. Now, there is a slight difference in the actual relation of this case to the House from the one of the last session, but that difference is very slight, so slight that I doubt whether we ought as a precedent to go into the investigation suggested by the gentleman. I make this suggestion for the benefit of all who may care to think of it, that the subject be allowed to lie over for another day at least, so that gentlemen may look at it, and that they may have the proposition in print and determine in their own minds whether it is a subject we ought to take official cognizance of in the House of Representatives.

I would prefer greatly to have a little time myself, and I think every member here who wants to set a wise precedent would be glad to have a little time for reflection before the House is called on to act in this matter. For myself, and I believe I can say for almost everybody, we would prefer to have time to make up our minds just how far we can go in a matter of this sort.

I will throw out the suggestion while I am on my feet. If we really go to work of vindicating ourselves against assaults made against us, it would probably take more committees than the House could spare from their seats to go around and make the investigations. In one sense we are compelled in this great roaring public life, with the Drummond light of the press blazing on us every day, to take our vindication of ourselves into our own hands. We are largely compelled to live down rather than talk down the things that may be said against us.

But, Mr. Speaker, I admit the force of what the gentleman has said in this regard, that the gravamen of the charge against him is in an official report of one of the late Congresses of the United States. Still, it is a matter relating to him when he was not a member of this House and had no relation to this House; and it remains for us to determine how far back we will go. I hope, therefore, that by unanimous consent this subject may lie over to come up to-morrow or any other day when the gentleman chooses to call it up.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that the point just stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that this is a matter which was brought out by congressional investigation, while the Chair did not wish to bring up that point himself, would have had great weight with him if he had been compelled to decide upon the admission of this resolution.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Inasmuch as my name has been mentioned in connection with this resolution, I deem it not improper, with the permission of the House, to say a word. Touching the article from the Cincinnati Gazette which has been read, I know nothing either of its origin or its history. Why it should be coupled with what I am alleged to have said in a speech at Music Hall I do not know.

I am not familiar with the charges that have been made against the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] in connection with Fort Pillow. I did not know at that time that such grave charges had ever been made against him. Still I must say that which is known to all our people, that his name has been identified with what was regarded at the time as the "Fort Pillow outrage." Beyond that I have not been familiar with the details of the charges made nor of the evidence presented in support of them.

I referred to the gentleman as connected with Fort Pillow, simply because in our section of the country he was better known in that connection than in any other way. I did not reiterate the charges, but called attention to him as one of the gentlemen who had been conspicuous in the "late unpleasantness."

I did not say that that gentleman had accused us of having been traitors; I did not use that language. But I did say that the plain intimation was, that the logic of what he said was, that in 1861 we were faithless to the Constitution and they were not; that they had stood by the Constitution and we did not; that in seceding from the Union they had simply exercised a constitutional right, and that we, in insisting that they should not secede, were violating and trespassing upon their constitutional right. This was the force and effect of the argument which I at least attempted to make. I said further, that I did not give the language used by General CHALMERS, but the ideas he expressed. Possibly I was not happy in my choice of language. The report which has been read here, and which I apprehend was taken from the Cincinnati Enquirer, is very imperfect and did me injustice. It is not a correct report. I did not say what that report alleges I did say.

I did argue and tried to maintain, and shall endeavor to maintain hereafter, that the logic of what the gentleman said upon this floor last week or week before last was to the effect that in 1861 we were not supporters and maintainers of the Constitution and that they were. That I understood to be the logic of the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS,] and I so said at Music Hall. Unless I am greatly disappointed I shall say so again, for I understand that to be the force of what he said.

Mr. CHALMERS. I am not complaining of that; I can take care of myself on that question when the time comes.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I only say this: that my argument was that the same ideas were advanced now as were advanced in 1861; that we at that time had different views from gentlemen on the other side, and that now we entertain the same views we did then, as they do. That is what I tried to say; nothing more and nothing less.

The SPEAKER. It is competent for the House to postpone this subject to a day certain. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] make that motion?

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that it be postponed for the present, to be called up by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] at his pleasure.

Mr. CLYMER. It is a privileged matter.

Mr. GARFIELD. It can be called up as a privileged matter.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think we may as well dispose of it now.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to postpone this subject for the present, to be called up when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] may choose to do so.

The motion to postpone was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 85, noes 69.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is requested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] to ask permission that William C. Shelley, a member of the Tennessee Legislature, be admitted to the floor of the House for the brief period that he may remain in Washington. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair will state that on yesterday a request of this character was made as to members of the New York Legislature and also as to a State officer of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. WHITE. I objected to it yesterday, and in order to maintain my consistency I object to the present request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then consider the objection as conclusive upon his submitting these requests, and hereafter members will be kind enough from their seats to submit the requests to the House.

Mr. FRYE. I hope that both requests will be again submitted to the House. I do not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] will maintain his objection.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to suggest to my colleague [Mr. WHITE] that he can vindicate his consistency by withdrawing his objection of yesterday.

Mr. WHITE. I am not alarmed about my consistency; but we passed a resolution at the commencement of the session to enforce one of the rules, that forbids the admission upon the floor of the House of any persons except those designated in the rule. We set that precedent last year and everybody here rejoiced at the result. Now we must stop somewhere. I do not care about this matter. It is very hard to resist the appeals of gentlemen about me.

Mr. TAYLOR. I withdraw my request.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. There is no question before the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I move, then, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. BRAGG. Pending that motion I move that when the House shall have resolved itself into Committee of the Whole we proceed to the end of the bill without disposing of the pending amendment, and then return to that amendment, which shall be considered under the rules regulating general debate, and that all debate thereon be closed in three hours.

Mr. ATKINS. I dislike to antagonize the motion just made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG;] but its adoption would result in the consumption of the entire day upon the subject of the particular amendment now pending, offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin. We have now been in session four weeks; and what have we accomplished? What are we accomplishing? For one I am anxious that we proceed to the passage of this appropriation bill, that it may be laid before the President of the United States for his signature or his disapproval, so that we may know how to shape our action. I for one am anxious to bring this session to a close as early as possible. I do not propose, so far as I am concerned, to refuse to co-operate with those who desire to pass certain legislation which may be necessary upon any subject. But, sir, we are here wasting time. We have now been longer upon this legislative bill than we were upon the same bill at the last session. We then went through sixty-one pages of the bill in a single day; we have now been about a week upon twenty pages of this bill.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin will be considered as other amendments to the bill are being considered, under the five-minute rule. I think this will allow to be said all that ought to be said.

The SPEAKER. The House has heretofore made an order upon the subject of debate in Committee of the Whole. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] now asks that the House give further instructions to the Committee of the Whole touching that subject.

Mr. CLYMER. I desire to submit a question to the Chair. Before we entered upon the discussion of this bill, the House made a general order directing that all the bill save the purely political part should be considered under the five-minute rule. A motion to reconsider the vote by which this order was made was laid on the table. I therefore submit that it is now impossible for us to reverse or modify that order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has caused the order of the House on this subject to be sent for, and when found it will be read.

Mr. BRAGG. I believe the language of the gentleman from Ohio in stating his propositions was that all amendments which would involve general discussion should be reserved.

Mr. CLYMER. I have stated in general terms my recollection of the action of the House. Possibly it may not be accurate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know in what terms the order may be recorded, but I remember very distinctly what I undertook to say. I referred to the political discussion likely to arise, having relation, as was well understood, to the election laws and the jury clause; and I asked the making of an order that all the rest of the bill should be discussed under the five-minute rule, those sections to which I particularly referred being reserved for general debate.

Mr. CLYMER. That is the way I understood it.

Mr. BAKER. So did everybody.

The SPEAKER. The order made by the House will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question, as the Chair understands it, is this, and he desires to be corrected if he be wrong: the bill at first in Committee of the Whole shall be proceeded with under the five-minute rule until the Committee of the Whole shall come to that part of the bill mentioned upon which general debate is wished, and that then general debate shall be under the hour rule.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. At that time, according to the recollection of the Chair, it was understood that the political questions, as stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] were those to be included in the general debate, and that all other parts of the bill were to be discussed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. I alluded, of course, to those political matters embraced in the bill as then printed. This proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin, not being then a part of the bill, could not, of course, have been in my mind.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read a part of the statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

Mr. CLYMER. And also, I suggest, the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in response to those of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, in conducting this bill I shall not attempt to apply the "gag" even if I had the power to do it. I am very conscious of the fact that no one man rules this House, not even the Speaker. We are governed by the rules which the House prescribes for its own government, but I thought I would suggest that, before going into Committee of the Whole this morning, perhaps it would be proper to dispense with general debate until we reach the amendments, which are generally styled political amendments; go through with the entire bill, the appropriations by paragraphs, under the five-minute rule, and when we get in Committee of the Whole to return to these political amendments if we have completed the balance of the bill.

Mr. COX. I would suggest to the gentleman that he dispense with the formal reading of the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I shall make that motion when we are in Committee of the Whole; that would be the proper time, but this is the time for the House to fix such limitation to general debate as it sees proper, and until we reach this clause of the bill, so far as I am concerned, I shall make no suggestion to the limitation of debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman that these objectionable sections might be passed over for general debate, and that we go on with all the money part of the bill, coming under the five-minute rule. I think that would be agreeable to this side of the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not understand the proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. I agree to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ATKINS. I would suggest that we have a distinct understanding that there shall be no general debate on the bill, except on that part relating to the supervisors, the test oath, and the deputy marshals.

Mr. GARFIELD. We will agree to that.

The SPEAKER. The question, as the Chair understands it, is this, and he desires to be corrected if he be wrong: the bill at first in Committee of the Whole shall be proceeded with under the five-minute rule until the Committee of the Whole shall come to that part of the bill mentioned, upon which general debate is wished, and that then general debate shall be under the hour rule.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CONGER. And in that connection, Mr. Speaker, the sections considered as embracing the political matters were ordered to be printed for the use of members.

Mr. CLYMER. It is manifest that the provisions in reference to the test oath, supervisors of elections, and deputy marshals were the subjects referred to as left open for general debate.

The SPEAKER. This order of the House has been partly executed.

Mr. GARFIELD. As the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has suggested, it was agreed at that time by unanimous consent that the political sections on which general debate was to be had should be printed in a separate paper as we now have them before us, being the provisions in reference to jurors, supervisors, and marshals—nothing else.

The SPEAKER. The subjects reserved for general debate were enumerated with distinctness in the debate which has been read.

Mr. GARFIELD. There can be no doubt, I think, about the meaning of the order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "repealed," at the end of line 2064, to and including the word "dollars," at the end of line 2085, and insert as follows:

Sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of chapter 116 of the law of 1871, approved March —, 1871, are hereby repealed.

Mr. BRAGG rose.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Before the gentleman from Wisconsin proceeds to discuss his amendment, I desire to offer a substitute so it may be before the committee at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the causes now pending before the southern claims commission be, and the same are hereby, transferred to the Court of Claims, there to be determined by the principles of law and equity governing the decision of causes now before it; and that the southern claims commission be, and the same is hereby, abolished.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, when I offered my proposition to repeal the law under which the southern claims commission was organized I had supposed it involved a question perhaps of sufficient gravity to have it entitled to the respectful consideration of this House. I did not think there were any members in this House who were unwilling to have that question discussed so that a vote might be taken after full discussion thereon. I expected to have heard from gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber a response almost unanimous in favor of the repeal of the law authorizing that court. I had every right to expect it. This law was passed by an unconstitutional and revolutionary method, passed in such way that the free choice and will of the Executive were coerced into the signing of the bill. And when I proposed to give to gentlemen on the other side an opportunity to use their votes to show they disapproved all such revolutionary legislation, I expected every one of them almost to rise in his place and thank God for the chance he had to carry into effect the talk which has been coming from that side for the last ten days; but I find, Mr. Chairman, to use a homely expression with regard to them, "it is all talk and no cider." [Laughter.]

Now, to understand what this law is, requires reference to the Army appropriation bill of 1871, where the law will be found in volume 16 of the statutes, upon page 524, organizing this court. By the very terms of the act itself the court was not expected to have had a longer existence than two years. It has been kept in existence by appropriation bills. Appropriation bills year after year have been extending the life of that court by furnishing the pabulum upon which it feeds, the salaries which keep the judges and the employés in their places. But I submit, sir, that is no way to create a judicial tribunal or a tribunal that is quasi-judicial.

The first objection which I have to this court is to the court itself, not to the members of it, not to the men composing it, not to the employés who execute its orders, but to the organization as a court. I may as well say here that it seemed as if, anticipating something that might be done, the persons who drew this bill and who incorporated it into the appropriation bill of 1871 and organized this body shrank from calling it a court, as well they might as its subsequent history has shown. But they saw fit to call it a commission. They clothed it with the powers of a court, and they authorized it to decide cases on testimony under oath, and such other evidence as anybody about that court might pick up and use. So that we have a commission organized who are not confined to evidence as it is known and fixed by rules of law, but the language of the law authorizing this institution provides it may act. I will read the language:

And the said commissioners in considering such claims shall be satisfied from the testimony of witnesses under oath, or from other sufficient evidence which may accompany each claim, &c., whether the facts are presented to the court in such way as to authorize the allowance of the claim.

Is not this an anomaly in this last half of the nineteenth century that we are organizing a court and that court shall have the right to proceed under the rules and regulations of their own, independent of what is known as evidence as it is termed and fixed and understood in the courts of law? Have we not another anomaly in this, that this court is authorized to employ, and this bill authorizes them to employ, detectives, and the practices of this court, as proved from the debate on Saturday, was that other evidence which they used besides the legal evidence known to the law is the unsworn, unofficial reports of detectives. So that we have a judicial tribunal organized and being run by a body of detectives.

Mr. SPARKS obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. BRAGG.

Mr. BRAGG. Whoever before heard of a detective agency as being used to the aiding of a judicial tribunal? Who are these detectives? I speak of them as a class. All over this broad country they have shown themselves to belong to so disreputable a class that it is almost impossible to get a jury in any State, North or South, to convict on any testimony they can offer unsupported. Now, that class of men are authorized to make official reports, which are unsworn and which no man shall have a right to examine, so that no man knows until after the blow has been struck what hit him, and then it is too late.

Is that such a tribunal as this country seeks to carry along in existence and pay at the rate of some $36,000 to $50,000 a year to keep it up? I say, Mr. Chairman, that this, instead of being intended to be a judicial tribunal, to be governed by the laws which govern courts, was devised as a political make-shift, and its judges were placed upon the bench as political partisans; and the machinery which was to manufacture and present to that court, unknown to claimants, the evidence or statements upon which they were to act was political partisan detectives, and the source through which they were to derive their evidence, if the man who made the claim was found to be hostile to the republican party, was the carpet-baggers of the South, who were to furnish to these detectives the reports that were necessary to blacken and defeat any claim unless that claim showed itself to be worthy of merit by the claimant proclaiming his allegiance to the republican party. It is a species of machinery that is a disgrace to the American statute-book.

I might perhaps have been contradicted on this floor, and it might have been alleged that such was not the way in which these cases were decided, but on Saturday last the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] announced that hundreds of cases were decided upon the unsworn testimony of these detectives; and we had the testimony of a gentleman, [Mr. HOUK,] who was himself the agent of that court, that he made reports, and that the court acted upon his reports, which were unknown to the parties in the case.

I see my friend from Ohio taking notes. I suppose he will say that the gentleman did not say "detectives." He did not say "detectives," Mr. Chairman; he spoke of the investigating agents. That is a very pleasant term. On the prairies and west of the Rocky Mountains the highwaymen and the robbers are called road agents; that is a higher grade of robbers. The partisan detectives of this court are called investigating agents, who are sent to snook around among the carpet-baggers and the servile race of the South, to see whether they can accept or allow a claim in their discretion, as these officers who have no limit on their power have a right to act as they see proper in the allowance or rejection of a claim.

I say it is a disgrace to the American statute-book. And I say the men who belong to the detective force, the men who are classed as detectives in the United States, are worthy of the language which was applied to such people by the great Irish barrister, Curran, at the Irish trials, when he said of them:

> They are a class of men who like dead bodies lie upon the bottom of the stream out of sight until after they have become buoyant with putrefaction, and then they rot as they rise to the surface and spread terror and contagion wherever they go.

That is the class of men who are authorized to be employed. I do not say that the men who are now employed are such men, but the power is in the court to authorize such men. And a court which is bound by no rule, which has a right to select its own tools, which sits there acting as this court has done, showing that it will determine rights not upon sworn evidence, but upon such reports as I have referred to, has proved that the terms which I have quoted with reference to the informer may properly be applied to the court itself.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COOK. If I am recognized, I yield my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.]

Mr. KEIFER. I had expected to hear some argument offered by the gentleman who submits this amendment for the repeal of the law creating the southern claims commission that went to the merits of the case. For a great many years this House has been entirely silent on the subject of laying down rules of practice for this court. To-day, after this committee has carefully prepared a rule to govern the court in future that takes away all the objections that are now urged by the gentleman from Wisconsin, we hear a ten-minute speech against the court because it has had in the past some agents who are said to have acted under rules that some of us thought were unwise.

Let us go to the merits of this question. The legislation which was postponed by action of the committee a few days ago will correct all of the evils that are now spoken of by the gentleman from Wisconsin; and when we were attempting to amend this bill so as to correct those evils the gentleman himself was silent, reserving his speech until after we had made the amendment. Now, Mr. Chairman, in the future there will be very little of importance in this matter of the rules for the conduct of cases before the commissioners of southern claims. On the 10th day of March last, under the present law, the time for taking testimony by the claimants in all cases expired. The term of the commissioners will expire on the 10th day of March, 1880, about eleven months hence.

The whole number of claims originally before the commissioners was 22,298. Of these claims over fourteen thousand have been reported upon and finally disposed of, leaving about eight thousand unreported and now in the hands of the commissioners, and of these eight thousand unreported claims about three thousand of the claimants have taken their testimony under the rules of the law and submitted their cases for decision to the commissioners, and the expenses of these claimants of taking their testimony under this law of Congress has averaged in each case about $30, making an outlay of $90,000 at least for all these claimants, expended in getting their cases ready for decision by the commissioners, who are now examining the claims and will be ready, as I am informed by one of the members of the commission, to finally report the claims on the 10th day of March, 1880.

Now, let me say that there are five thousand of these claims as to which not one particle of testimony has been taken at all. These claims now, under the statute passed by the last Congress, are absolutely barred unless we repeal these sections that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] proposes to repeal, and the effect of that repeal would be to revive five thousand claims now barred by the statute. They ought to be barred. Under an amendment which was put on a bill of this House in the Senate in the last Congress, and adopted in this House, the commission was required to report to the next regular session of this Congress the names of all of these claimants with their claims, so that we will have a record here of five thousand of these barred claims.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to ask the gentleman if he thinks that this court should always live, because if we revive the act authorizing their appointment we shall revive barred claims, barred by lapse of time.

Mr. KEIFER. We do not propose to let the court live a single hour beyond the 10th day of March, 1880.

Mr. BRAGG. Will not these claims revive then?

Mr. KEIFER. These five thousand claims are absolutely barred unless we by legislation revive them and dump them into this Congress. If we do that, no less than five thousand claimants would come with claims, and with some equity, telling us, "You passed a law authorizing us to prepare and present our claims, and we have spent thousands and thousands of dollars in preparing our claims, and we have done it upon the faith of a law of the United States; we were ready to submit them when the court was wiped out."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAWK obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. KEIFER.

Mr. KEIFER. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

So much for that part of the case.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly; I shall be very glad to hear it.

Mr. BRAGG. The repeal of the provisions of the act which I propose to repeal would not repeal any statute of limitation at all.

Mr. KEIFER. It would repeal all this legislation and the legislation which would affect these claims. All I desire to say here upon that branch is, that we are ready to have a final adjudication, favorable or unfavorable, of three thousand claims with the testimony taken. Is it wise for Congress now to repeal these sections of the statute and wipe out this commission? It is no argument against this commission to say that they have had at some time or other in the past, what the gentleman chooses to denominate "detectives." Whatever I may have said the other day—and the gentleman admitted that he did not quote me correctly, and I will not stop to correct him—I wish to add that these detectives, or more properly speaking agents, have uniformly acted in the interest of the Government. If they have erred, it was against the claimant and not against the Government.

Now, upon the question as to whether these claims should be paid, I have heard nothing on the other side, and from the large number of claimants who have had their claims allowed, small and great, there are less than seven thousand out of twenty thousand odd presented to the commissioners, and the record shows that about 10 per cent. of the number of claims allowed were the claims of Union soldiers. The court records will show that not one of them—unless the commissioners were cheated, or some fraud was perpetrated upon it—was disloyal in any way during the entire war.

The law is not now and never has been so that these commissioners could allow and pay for damages caused by the war to loyal or disloyal claimants, but to pay for supplies furnished and which the Government had the benefit of, quartermaster and commissary stores, those things that the Government received when the war was going on and used for the purpose of carrying on the war.

We have thought it wise in the past to provide a law to pay them all, and for my part I have always believed that it was honest in the Government to do it; honest to pay Union men and loyal men for that which they furnished to carry on the war to a successful issue. Farther than that I have never been willing to go. Even though the law may have been originally an unwise one, still it would be exceedingly unjust, it would be an outrage, if I may use the term, to now say to these claimants, after they have prepared their cases under a law that has been on the statute-book for eight years, and by which they have been invited to prepare their cases and bring them to the court—it would be unjust to say to them that the court is to be wiped out, and the law that gave them the right to go before that tribunal and have their claims adjudicated there was also to be wiped out. That would be unjust; it would be inviting them to a feast and then not giving it to them.

In regard to the three thousand claimants whose claims are now ready to be adjudicated, in which cases by an absolute statute the testimony on behalf of the claimants has been closed, if you wipe out this law those claimants will come here to Congress, for it would be the only place where they could come, and they will come here with an equity and say to us that we passed a law which authorized them to prepare their cases and present their claims, and then we took away the law before they could obtain a final adjudication of their claims.

I am in favor of a good statute of limitation to put an end to all this matter of southern claims; but I do not believe in the Government being unjust and entrapping any claimant.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ATKINS. I would not say a word on this subject if it were not that I feel that the Committee on Appropriations should give some reason for the legislation which they have here proposed.

I will say to the Committee of the Whole that the suggestion and the advice of the gentleman who served during the Forty-fifth Congress as chairman of the Committee on War Claims furnished perhaps the strongest argument to the Committee on Appropriations why it should make this appropriation and extend the time for the adjudication of these claims. Mr. Eden, of Illinois, stated to the committee, or at least to some of the members of the committee, that he thought it very proper that the time of the services of this commission should be extended for another year, so that the commission could wind up the business before it; otherwise the three thousand cases before that commission at this time would have to be turned over to some other tribunal.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ATKINS. I will.

Mr. BRAGG. I will ask the gentleman whether the year previous the time was not extended under the same promise?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir; it was; that is true. But the commissioners stated that they found it utterly impossible to get through with all the cases before them in the time allowed.

There have been over twenty thousand cases brought before that commission. About fourteen thousand cases have been reported upon. There are unreported about eight thousand cases. Of that eight thousand cases there are five thousand actually barred, because the statute provided that the testimony in these cases should be taken on or before the 10th day of March last. The testimony not having been taken in these five thousand cases, they are actually barred.

There are, then, to-day about three thousand cases in which the testimony has been taken in part; indeed in most of the cases all the testimony has been taken. There are about three hundred cases now in the hands of the agents. Testimony has been concluded in about twenty-seven hundred cases; and in regard to the other three hundred cases now in the hands of the agents, it is said that the testimony will soon be concluded.

The members of this commission inform me that they can get through this business by the 10th of March next, and submit their report to Congress. My judgment was, and still is, that we had better make that disposition of these cases.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ATKINS. I will.

Mr. HOOKER. What is the amount which this bill proposes to appropriate to keep this commission alive another year?

Mr. ATKINS. I think it is about $27,000.

Mr. HOOKER. If the amendment offered by your colleague [Mr. YOUNG] is adopted, as well as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] breaking up this court and transferring these cases to a tribunal already established and paid for, would not that save this $27,000?

Mr. ATKINS. By no means. It would only defer the settlement of these claims indefinitely so far as that is concerned.

Mr. HOOKER. But it would save this appropriation.

Mr. ATKINS. I am an economist, but I do not propose to be an economist at the expense of the rights of the claimants. These claimants have now expended $100,000 in taking testimony and preparing their cases to be adjudicated by this commission. To take those cases now and hand them over to a court, perhaps already overburdened with business, would be an indefinite postponement of the rights of these parties.

Mr. HOOKER. Would it be an increase of a single dollar of expenditure to the Government?

Mr. ATKINS. It would be a denial of their rights. Why should the gentleman sit here and vote $3,000,000 in this bill for the purpose of maintaining the Federal courts if it is not for the protection of the rights of parties? It is absolutely necessary that Congress should appropriate money in order to have courts maintained where the rights of parties may be determined.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAKER obtained the floor.

Mr. ATKINS. This way of farming out the floor for five minutes to a gentleman is not exactly the thing. I have not got through one-half of what I have to say. But I will take my seat, and will now serve notice that I shall object to any gentleman going on beyond the time allowed by the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact——

Mr. ATKINS. I am not blaming the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. That when it was proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] to yield his time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] the Chair said it could be done only by unanimous consent

A MEMBER. And that unanimous consent was given.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; there was no objection.

Mr. BAKER. There are only two questions that can be involved in the proposition presented by the gentleman from Wisconsin. The first is, whether it is right that parties who have their claims pending before the southern claims commission should be allowed to have those cases disposed of. That question involves the consideration whether it is right that the class of supplies which these men furnished to the Union Army should be paid for or not. The allowances that are made are simply for stores and supplies, such as horses, mules, cattle, sheep, and other articles of personal property that were taken possession of and used for the support of the national armies during the war of the rebellion; and before any one of these claimants is entitled to compensation he must among other things establish the fact that he was loyal to the National Government during the war of the rebellion. Now I know that the distinguished gentleman who introduced this amendment has undertaken—I do not know with what motive—by raising a hue and cry to lead the country to believe that there was no merit at all in any of these claims which have been presented and paid in years gone by.

Mr. BRAGG rose.

Mr. BAKER. I cannot yield to the gentleman; I have only five minutes. I know there is a disposition (I do not attribute it to the gallant gentleman from Wisconsin) to have it believed over the country that there is no difference in the South in reference to any class of claims presented either here or before the courts. I have heard it stated by the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin that he did not believe there were any loyal men in the South. Mr. Chairman, of the men whose claims have been allowed by the southern claims commission seven hundred out of sixty-five hundred served in the Union Army. The State of Tennessee sent thirty-three Union regiments into the war, the State of Arkansas sent ten, and there were thirty or forty other regiments from the Southern States in the Union Army. I believe that the men who "wore the blue" in defense of the country's integrity in the war of the rebellion are, although they happened to live south of the Potomac River, as much entitled to compensation as those who lived north of it, and who have been or will be paid every dollar for every article they furnished of the character provided for in this law.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it will be an unhappy day for this country when the principle is established by the American Congress that when a citizen who has been loyal in the hour of the country's danger asks payment for supplies that were used by the military forces of the nation he is to be answered that his claim stands on the same footing as the claims of men who used every power with which God and nature had endowed them to destroy the nation.

I submit, then, that the first proposition to which I referred in opening must be decided in the affirmative. As to the results which would follow from the abolition of this southern claims commission, they have been indicated in the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Tennessee, showing that this House would be deluged by a mass of three thousand claims in which evidence has already been taken on the part of the claimants, although there are about three hundred in which the Government is taking rebutting evidence; or if those claims are not brought here they will, as is suggested, be sent either to some new court to be created or to the Court of Claims sitting in this city, which is already overburdened with business; so that to send these claims either to that tribunal or before a committee of Congress would amount to a denial of justice to the three thousand men who have expended from $90,000 to $100,000 in reliance upon the public faith, plighted by an act of Congress, that they should have a hearing before this commission.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I agree with very much that has been said by the gentleman from Wisconsin in reference to the necessity for the abolition of the southern claims commission; and I concur in very much that has been said by the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Indiana in reference to the necessity for some tribunal to determine these claims. I take it that there are very few gentlemen upon this floor—especially those who have had a legal training—who read or heard the argument of the gentleman from Indiana on Friday last, who will not concur in the opinion that this commission should be abolished without the delay of a single hour. I can present no stronger argument in support of the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin than was embodied in the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, and if I had it at hand I would read his speech as a part of the remarks I shall make myself, for as he appears to be the friend of the commission his opinions and utterances in respect to its incompetency will possibly carry more weight than my own. According to his testimony such a court cannot be abolished too soon. I say nothing of the personnel of the court, for I know nothing; but I do condemn the mode and manner in which they discharge their judicial functions.

I do not know, however, that I should vote for this amendment without providing for some tribunal to take the place of the one we now have, for I hold that it is the duty of this Government to the citizen to provide some tribunal before which his demand against it can be fairly, honestly, and legally tried. The only question in my mind is whether this can be more effectually done by the southern claims commission or by the Court of Claims. I grant that neither of these tribunals commends itself to my judgment. I would be glad if a better one could be provided as a substitute for both.

A great deal has been said here about the payment of southern claims, and I wish I had time to discuss that question more fully than I can do in the limited time now allowed me by the rules governing this discussion. I have heard it said by gentlemen here that there were no loyal men in the South. That is a mistake. There were some loyal men in the South; men as true in their fealty to the Federal Union, to the integrity and the preservation of the Federal Government, as any man who resided in any Northern State; and I tell you, sir, that it required something of courage, something of heroism, something of iron nerve for a man to be a Union man in the South in the hot blaze of popular passion just preceding and during the war. I tried it a little while myself, and I know the difficulties of the undertaking. I tell you that there are men in the South to-day whose courage and heroism in all that fearful ordeal entitles them to the most favorable consideration of this Government; and, indeed, to a preference, if any is to be shown. In every particular the number was small, but still there were those there whose fidelity to the Union never faltered, and many of them suffered the most serious losses.

For the class of claimants who cast their fortunes with the South in its struggle for political independence, who staked their all upon the success of the confederate cause, and who now come asking the Government to pay them for their losses, I have but little sympathy. So far as I am concerned, for the humble part I took in that unfortunate strife I have no favor to ask at the hands of the Government other than has already been accorded me, nor does any other man like me in the South.

Mr. BRAGG. Allow me to ask the gentleman how many men in the South rejoiced in the defeat of the confederate arms?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I do not know that there were a great many in that part of the South where I lived, I must confess; but still there were some. I must say, too, that some of them were as reputable men as any on this floor, as good citizens as any in my State. The number was small to be sure, but that has nothing to do with the question. If any citizen has a claim against the Government he is entitled to a fair and impartial hearing, and I submit to this House that it will not do to say this Government will repudiate those claims. There are to-day but two civilized governments in the world, if I am correctly informed, and they are semi-civilized, which deny to their citizens the right to bring suit against them for any demand they may have. The governments of the Old World, except Russia and Turkey, all give this right to the citizen, and it is nowhere denied in any government in the world claiming to be civilized. What is given the subject under despotic governments surely ought not to be withheld from the citizen in a free republic.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I generally sympathize with my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] in his opposition to war claims. When I find a bill presented to this House fourteen years after the close of the war I always suspect there is something wrong or dishonest in it. And that gentleman and myself have usually on such questions voted together. I am glad to follow in that respect such a distinguished leadership.

But that is not the distinct proposition before this body. The distinct proposition now is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] to the proposition offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is to abolish the southern claims commission and to transfer all pending cases to the Court of Claims, a court which has existed for years in this country and which, as properly has been said, is now overburdened with business.

I am opposed to that proposition because it may do injustice to the claimants themselves, and may by changing the tribunal do injustice to the Government. I am opposed also to the sweeping proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin to "wipe out" by one motion in this House the existence of this court. I have not time to pause to discuss the policy of the original constitution of this commission. But suffice it to say that it was not done for mere political purposes. It was done as a matter of justice, and there was abundant precedent for the Government to follow in enacting such legislation.

In answer to the criticisms of my friend from Wisconsin, who has talked about the political policy of creating this commission, I will point to the history of the legislation following the war of 1812. In the enactments of that day I discover provision was made by the Government for indemnity to its citizens for some of the losses which they sustained during that war with Great Britain. There is no legal liability against the Government for the casualties of war, but every well-regulated government has recognized the duty or the charity which it is occasionally called upon to extend to its own citizens.

The condition of things we found following the war of the rebellion was sui generis. We had been fighting with our own people. We had been fighting against organized States in which were large elements devoted to the flag of the country and which had remained true to it under very trying circumstances. It must be admitted that it was only fair to them to create some tribunal which would give their claims a judicial investigation. Now, that judicial investigation has been conducted according to principles of law well recognized everywhere, and no well-grounded complaint has been made against it. I say now, in view of the fact that we have a statute of limitations, for the prohibition of the presentation of any claim after the 1st of March, 1873, is practically a statute of limitations, that we should maintain the existence of this tribunal until it has concluded its present business. Believing that the proposition after it is "boiled down" means just this, I therefore shall vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee and the proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MANNING. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the substitute submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG.] It seems that we but poorly understand some facts of importance touching this matter. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] and the gentleman from Tennessee, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, have stated that the Court of Claims is already too much occupied, that it is now burdened with cases. If that be true it is certainly an important fact in connection with the pending matter, but I do not understand these gentlemen to be correct in making that statement to this House. My information is obtained from the reports for the last three years from the Court of Claims. Gentlemen will bear in mind that their opposition to this substitute is largely based on the idea that the Court of Claims cannot undertake the work that it is now proposed to transfer to it. If it turns out they are mistaken in that, much of their opposition of course is thereby disposed of.

If I tell gentlemen that the court only sits in the aggregate about two months in the year in the determination of cases depending in that tribunal, then they will inquire why it is they do not work more. I made the same inquiry myself when I ascertained this fact. I found that in the time stated that court disposed of only fifty-five cases in the year 1876, and seventy-six cases in the following year, and one hundred in the year 1878. This needs explanation before we can acquit these gentlemen of great tardiness or of negligence in the discharge of the duties that devolve upon them as members of that court, provided their docket is crowded with cases.

Now, I do not pretend to intimate that a great many cases in addition to those I have spoken of have not been disposed of in some way or other during the period to which I have referred. But I am speaking of cases which have involved the consideration of records and proofs. I am not speaking of those which have been disposed of on motions of counsel to dismiss. The presumption must be indulged that this court is not overworked, otherwise their sessions would be longer, and a great many more would be disposed of per annum.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the southern claims commission ought to be abolished. I do not believe that a case can be correctly determined on ex parte proof. I can understand how a fraud can be easily committed, if that shall be the standard in reaching the justice of a cause. In some of the cases which have gone into the southern claims commission we cannot be left in doubt of the fact that the Treasury has been robbed under the forms of law. I would transfer these causes to the Court of Claims, where testimony must be taken, and where the same rules of evidence obtain as in other courts of justice known to the laws of this country. I would transfer them to a court that is not overworked. I would do away with the commission, because it cannot properly and safely determine causes, and because it exists at an annual cost of perhaps $40,000, which sum would be saved by the proposed transfer.

It is proposed by the Committee on Appropriations to continue the southern claims commission only until the 10th of next March. Since the creation of this commission in 1871 not more seventeen hundred and fifty cases have been disposed of in any single year, and from this it will be seen that but little more than half of the three thousand cases yet undisposed of, and in which proof has been taken, can be decided before this commission is dissolved by limitation of law.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MANNING. Yes, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. If the Court of Claims can only get through fifty or sixty cases in a year, how long will it take them to get through three thousand cases?

Mr. MANNING. The transfer of these causes will require the court to have longer sessions.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I will say to my friend from Mississippi that at the rate of seventy cases a year it would take the Court of Claims forty years or more to get through those three thousand cases.

Mr. MANNING. But is that an objection to the argument I have been submitting?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I think it is an answer to it.

Mr. MANNING. The southern claims commission say they cannot get through with the cases in the time allowed.

Mr. ATKINS. They say they can.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. FINLEY. If the Chair will recognize me I will yield him my time.

Mr. ATKINS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RUSSELL] is recognized.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Whatever may be the purpose of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and it is immaterial what his purpose is, the effect of the amendment he has proposed is to fling not only an injury but an insult upon the men of the South. And, sir, I undertake to say that if there is any class of men under this Government who deserve the consideration of this Government, to whom the people of these United States owe a debt of gratitude which they have never paid, it is the Union men of the Southern States. You may search history in vain among the instances where men have suffered and endured for opinion's sake—the Huguenots of France; the Dissenters of Scotland; the Puritans of England—you will search history in vain to find an instance more illustrious than that of the Union men of North Carolina and Eastern Tennessee. They suffered for a principle. It cost nothing to be a Union man upon the shores of Lake Michigan; it cost nothing to be a Union man under the protection of the Union Army; but the men who stood by the flag upon southern soil displayed the patriotism and the valor worthy of heroes and of martyrs.

Not only that, sir, but injustice is done to the men of the South in this attempt which is made by the gentleman from Wisconsin and others who think as he does to make it appear that there were no Union men in the South. I am gratified to hear gentlemen upon that side admit that there were Union men in the South of respectability. It has become, Mr. Chairman, respectable in this country and on this floor to slur the Union men of the South. It has got to be the high-toned thing, the highly respectable thing, to make it appear that there were no decent men true to the Union on southern soil. Sir, the assertion or the insinuation is a slander upon men who were the equals of the gentlemen who have made that statement or of any other gentlemen upon this floor. [Applause.]

What, sir, is this proposition? It is to take the property of the loyal men of the South, and after having taken it for the support of your armies, while they perhaps were themselves fighting and giving their blood for the defense of your flag, to take that property and then refuse to pay them for it. The gentleman may say this does not exclude a decision of their claims; but what tribunal does he propose to establish?

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RUSSELL] has expired.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. I am willing to hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. WARNER. Does the gentleman propose to ask this House to appropriate money to pay for property of Union men which he as an officer in the confederate service, as I understand he was, helped to destroy?

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. No, sir; and the gentleman knows I do not.

Mr. HAYES. If I am recognized I yield my time to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Objection was made.

Mr. HOOKER. I had hoped that this matter would have been passed upon without any reference to political considerations. It was simply a proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin to amend this appropriation bill in this respect and to abolish the southern claims commission. I do not think it would have been proper for the committee or the House to have accepted the proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin unless accompanied by the amendment which has been offered by my friend from Tennessee, but with that amendment ingrafted upon the proposition it commends itself to my judgment and is, I think, the course which the House should pursue.

It will be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that when this bill was passed it was discussed in the Senate. It came originally from the Committee of Claims in this House in 1871, and was reported by Mr. Washburn, of Massachusetts, and he then stated that it had received the deliberate consideration of the Court of Claims and that they believed such a commission ought to exist.

It did not pass as it was reported from the Committee of Claims; but afterward it was elaborately discussed in the Senate, and it was said by the late Senator from Indiana, (Mr. Morton,) in the discussion of the question, that it was a strange proposition to create one tribunal in which you were to have an adjudication on claims of loyal men of the South and another tribunal to adjudicate on the claims of loyal men from the North. Hence he and several other Senators who acted with him were opposed to the bill as it passed; but it passed the Senate by a large vote, and afterward passed the House. It did, however, create a tribunal utterly unknown to the law of any civilized country.

It created a nondescript tribunal clothed with powers and authority to do that which no court of justice had ever done in any country before, to take ex parte testimony by its own private agents, call them what you will, but sent out by the authority of the commission, and, according to the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER,] generally sent out in the interest of the Government as against the claims of the claimants. It was on such reports to a large extent that the adjudications of this tribunal have been predicated. I agree, therefore, to the proposition that this tribunal ought to be wiped out of existence, and I had hoped that it would have commended itself to my distinguished friend from Tennessee, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and that he, always so careful to protect the revenues of the country, when there is a tribunal already established to attend to such claims, would have been willing to save the $27,220 necessary to keep in existence this tribunal and leave it to the Court of Claims to discharge these duties.

If the present incumbents of the Court of Claims are not capable of deciding these cases, then let men capable of deciding them be put in their places. But sweep from the law the anomaly of a court which can take evidence upon one side of a case without notice to the other side. I think, however, it would be an act of great injustice to abolish this tribunal and not provide that suits already pending with the evidence taken shall be transferred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] that this commission has arbitrary rules of evidence, and if the evidence were transferred to the Court of Claims it would not be received there. The evidence would have to be taken de novo.

Mr. HOOKER. Well, I think that would be justice.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not desire to discuss this question at all, but I have for three or four years, and during my service in this House, heard the declaration made upon this floor that there were no loyal men in the South during the late war.

I wish to say here, Mr. Chairman, now, that it was my fortune during a portion of the war to serve in the South, and especially in my own native State, and I know, sir, that there were no more loyal people in the United States of America than were the great body of the people of East Tennessee during the late war. I myself, sir, served for more than a year during the late war with several Tennessee regiments, as loyal regiments, as brave and gallant regiments as ever followed our flag, and I know that there were no men ever more devoted to the American flag and the American Union than those soldiers of my native State with whom I served.

I have sat here and heard these remarks from time to time that there was no loyalty in the South during the late war, no devotion to the Union, until I feel that it would be an act of injustice for me longer to remain silent when I hear these remarks made. Sir, I have always believed and shall believe it to my dying day that the State of Tennessee was absolutely forced out of the Union against the sentiments of a great majority of its people at the time it went out.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDERSON. I have but a moment and cannot yield. I am opposed and have been opposed and will go as far as any gentleman upon this floor in opposing the allowance of claims to those who were disloyal to the Government of their country; but I say that until we put a stop to the allowance of all claims of whatever description I am opposed to any discrimination between the loyal people of the South and the loyal people of the North; and, if anything, I would give the preference to the soldier or the claimant of the South who, as the gentleman from North Carolina says, maintained his Unionism when it was almost at the peril of life that he did it.

Now, sir, I believe this, that perhaps there ought to be some limitation and some restriction made in regard to this subject of claims, but surely there should be no distinction between the men of the South who were loyal to the Union and the men of the North who were loyal to the Union in the presentation and allowance of their claims by Congress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ATKINS. I now call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. YOUNG,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the causes now pending before the southern claims commission be, and the same are hereby, transferred to the Court of Claims, there to be determined by the principles of law and equity governing the decision of cases now before it; and that the southern claims commission be, and the same is hereby, abolished.

Mr. WHITE. I make the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot raise a point of order against an amendment after it has been discussed for an hour.

Mr. WHITE. Very well; it changes existing law in regard to rules of evidence.

Mr. GARFIELD. The substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] is objectionable for one reason which I have not heard referred to in this debate, and which gentlemen should consider before they vote upon it.

The southern claims commission, strictly speaking, is not a court at all; it is a commission appointed to aid Congress in determining what claims of a certain class it will pay. It has no judicial functions except to administer oaths, take testimony, examine claims, and report to Congress the facts found. It acts under a special statute which prescribes the class of cases to be examined, and it rejects all claims unless satisfactory proof of the loyalty of the claimant is offered.

Not so with the Court of Claims. That is a regular court of the United States. Its causes may be appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. It has been again and again decided by the Supreme Court that a pardon annihilates the distinction in law between loyalty and disloyalty. Therefore, as nearly all persons have been pardoned, either by general proclamation or by special acts of Congress, ninety-nine one-hundredths of all the claims which have been before the southern claims commission, if sent to the Court of Claims under this amendment, will go there needing no proof whatever of loyalty.

Therefore the proposed amendment substantially abolishes all distinction hitherto made in our laws, that claims arising out of the war shall not be paid except to persons loyal to the Government during the war. This fact should be fatal to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. YOUNG.] If we pass it, let us do so with our eyes open to the fact it sends all these claims, eight thousand in number, still pending before the southern claims commission, to a court where, under its rules, which according to this amendment are to prevail, the distinction of loyalty and disloyalty cannot be maintained, and we shall be called upon to pay a new class of claims for large amounts hitherto entirely unknown to our law.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. Do not the laws of war, as well as the law of nations, hold that every man who lives in an insurrectionary district is an enemy, and that no liability exists for any of the property taken from him, used, destroyed or anything of that kind, by the conquering power?

Mr. GARFIELD. But that will not avail my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] in this matter. It is proposed in the pending amendment to confer upon the Court of Claims jurisdiction over these claims, according to their rules for treating claims in accordance with the laws governing the class of claims which now go to that court. This amendment abolishes, by statute, the rule of law of which the gentleman speaks.

Mr. BRAGG. Another question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well.

Mr. BRAGG. When these claims come before the Court of Claims they are to be determined according to law. And is not the law such that no disloyal claimant can recover in that court or any other? And is not that the reason which led the republican party to establish this commission?

Mr. GARFIELD. I answer the gentleman that by repeated decisions of the Court of Claims and of the Supreme Court of the United States they have affirmed that the pardon of a claimant removes not only his political but his legal disabilities, and thus for the purpose of presenting a claim there is no distinction in that court between loyalty and disloyalty.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Will some gentleman allow me a few minutes of his time?

Mr. HAWLEY. If I may be allowed to do so I will yield the gentleman my time.

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot consent to that; it has been denied to so many others that I must insist upon a strict enforcement of the rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not ask anything that has been denied to others.

Mr. ATKINS. Has not debate closed upon the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. BRAGG. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. YOUNG.] It has been said here that the "gentleman from Wisconsin" had a purpose, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] did not know what that purpose was. I can tell him. My purpose is to prevent this Government from paying any debts that it is not legally liable to pay. That is my first purpose. My second purpose is to prevent gentlemen on the other side, who advocate loyalty upon the floor of this House, from issuing campaign documents and calling us confederates who are attempting to rob the Government, and denouncing me as the coadjutor of the South distributing "taffy" to the South. I want these gentlemen to face the music. They have hidden themselves long enough behind the shadow of "loyalty." Loyalty! Were a large majority of the people of Tennessee loyal? Then why, in God's name, did that State go out of the Union, costing us more blood and treasure to restore it to its place than any other State except Virginia? If the loyalty of the people of Tennessee allowed that State to give us so much resistance and trouble it is a proper punishment to them that we make the laws of nations applicable to them. The people with whom you live are the people by whom you are to be judged. Was North Carolina loyal? When did the gentleman from that State [Mr. RUSSELL] learn about those gallant, "loyal" people of North Carolina. Serving himself in the confederate army, I am not surprised that, coming from a State where, under carpet-bag rule, a confederate captain could leave the army to go to the Legislature and from thence graduate a republican judge without ever having been an inmate of a law office, to him the rules of law and evidence adopted by the court of commissioners of claims seem wise and fitting and meet with favor. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, that there may be no mistake about the law, I desire to read in answer to the shift that is given to this matter by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] what the Supreme Court has said upon this identical question; and while I agree with him that the substitute ought not to be adopted, I maintain that the abolition of this court disposes of these cases. The Supreme Court of the United States has applied the rule that whether a man is an enemy or not is determined by the community in which he lives. They say:

> But this court cannot inquire into the personal character and disposition of individual inhabitants of enemy territory. We must be governed by the principles of public law so often announced from the bench as applicable alike to civil and international law; that all people of each State or district in insurrection against the United States must be regarded as enemies until by the action of the Legislature and the executive, or otherwise, that relation is thoroughly and permanently changed.

Now, I say that for the purposes of the application of the principle of international law every one of these men that you are talking about was an enemy. No one of them has any legal claim against the Government, and when we commence opening the doors of the Treasury to them we do it as a matter of gratuity, and we ask these men who lost their all in that cause to vote to tax themselves to pay men who were disloyal to them as well as disloyal to us—men with whom it was "good Lord and good devil," depending upon the flag that floated in front of the place where they were living during the war. [Laughter and applause.] You ask that the burdens of people already overburdened with taxation, people groaning under the payment of taxes raised for the purpose of meeting the honest and legitimate demands of the Government, shall be increased in violation of international law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the general doctrine of belligerency in a territorial war is of course understood by everybody as including technically as enemies all of the inhabitants of the hostile territory. That general doctrine is recognized by lawyers everywhere. But nobody, so far as I know, unless it be the gentleman from Wisconsin, has ever denied that, during our late war and since, the Supreme Court has repeatedly determined that the question of loyalty could not be raised against a claimant if a pardon had been granted him by the President or Congress; that by a pardon disloyalty is wiped out, so far as his legal rights before the court are concerned. This is an answer to all that has been said on that point.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] agrees with me that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] ought not to be adopted. He thinks, however, that the southern claims commission ought to be abolished, because he thinks it was a mistake from the first to pay any loyal claims from the South. On that point I take issue with him; and I wish to refer to some official statistics which I prepared at the last session, in view of a statement then made and now repeated in this debate. It was said by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] that 99 per cent. of all the people of the seceded States were disloyal, in our sense of that word; that almost every Southern man who amounted to anything belonged to that category. I desire to traverse that proposition by some facts. Leaving out of view all the border States, do gentlemen know that there were from the States that went into seeession and rebellion military organizations amounting to fifty regiments and seven companies of white men who were regularly mustered into our Army and who fought bravely under our flag? I have the official record in my hand. Passing to the border Southern States, which did not secede, but whose people were divided, do gentlemen know that in the State of Kentucky alone more white soldiers fought under our flag than Napoleon took into the battle of Waterloo, more than all the allied armies which Wellington commanded at that battle? Do they not know that Missouri furnished one hundred and eighteen regiments of white soldiers to the Union Army; that the Southern States furnished one hundred and eighty-six thousand colored troops to the Union Army, and that of these ninety thousand were from the States which seceded, twenty thousand coming from the State of Kentucky?

Mr. BRAGG. Did Kentucky go into the rebellion?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, I excluded Kentucky. I say that from the States that seceded and went into the rebellion 50,700 white soldiers fought in our ranks and under our flag. And this statement does not include the thousands of individual men who came into our lines, and joined northern regiments. To say that these men were enemies and had no legal rights, and that the Government should not pay them or their families all proper claims for supplies and other property taken from them by the Government they were defending is a proposition I had hoped no man on either side of this House would make; and I am glad to know that the gentlemen who fought against us in the field do not make it. Not one of them has yet indorsed it. It remains for one of our own soldiers, the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] to say that there ought to be nothing paid to any man, however loyal, if he came from the South. I am sure that even this House, consisting so largely of confederate soldiers, will denounce this proposition as in the highest degree inequitable and unjust. Let the southern claims commission continue until it has acted on the cases now before it, and then let us muster it out, for the cases not already presented are barred by the statute of limitation. Let us not enlarge the claim business, but let us complete it; and most of all, let us not so change the law as to abolish the distinction between loyal and disloyal claims, making the latter payable, which the law has never done.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR. I move to strike out the last word. I feel it to be my duty, Mr. Chairman, to the constituency which I represent in this House to rise in their defense. I represent a constituency which were as true to the Union and as true to the flag as the constituency of the gentleman from Wisconsin; and if he means to intimate that the people of East Tennessee were not loyal to the flag, but were enemies to the Government, then in the name of the thirty thousand soldiers who fought under the Union flag from East Tennessee, in the good name of the people I represent, I hurl it back in his teeth. [Applause on the republican side of the House.]

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, the remarkable statement has been made that fifty thousand men from States other than border States of the South joined the Union Army during the late war. Upon what data such an extraordinary statement is based I am at a loss to know. Permit me to say, for one I do not believe it. I know something about some enlistments toward the close of the war of deserters from the rebel army and stragglers from the Morgan raid who came into our lines and some of whom joined our camp and received support in that way, but that they ever fired a shot or helped to fight a battle I do not believe. The idea that fifty thousand white Union men from the South beyond the border States joined Union regiments to fight in the Union cause is preposterous. It is something not heard of during the war. It is very singular that, after having tried to make political capital for four years out of these southern claims, that side of the House should now appear solid in support of continuing this commission and paying claims which they have declared to be raids upon the Treasury. If this commission is kept up a hundred years, at the end of that time we would be no nearer an equitable adjustment of the wrongs of the war than now. We might as well attempt to restore old Lisbon to its place beside the sea, as it was before the earthquake shook it down, as to restore things in this country as they were before the war. We cannot call back the dead and we cannot restore lost property, and we cannot prevent the suffering that has already taken place, and there is no use in attempting it. The sooner it is all forgotten the better, and the sooner the southern claims commission is ended and it is understood this Government is to pay no more of such claims the better it will be for the whole country.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend the substitute by adding the following:

Provided, That the cases thus transferred to the Court of Claims shall be subject to the same defense by the Government which could have been made if pending in said commission.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. If that does not carry with it this ex parte testimony taken before the Court of Claims I will not object to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Not at all. My object is to meet the objection raised by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who stated that in the Court of Claims it would not be competent for the Government to object to any claim on the ground of disloyalty of the claimant, while in the southern claims commission it would. For the purpose of meeting this objection I have offered this amendment which provides that the same defense may be made in all these cases transferred to the Court of Claims which could have been made in the southern claims commission. If this amendment is adopted that objection will be removed.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I feel it is my duty to state to this House that I think it would be a very great wrong to these three thousand claimants who have now prepared their cases and have paid $100,000 to be ready for a hearing—I think it would be unjust to them to take all of these cases and dump them into another court, and one, too, which the gentleman from Mississippi himself says does not decide more than fifty or sixty cases a year. I am not here to speak for loyal claimants specially. I have no constituents that I know of who are presenting claims before this commission; at least I do not know of any. I am not aware of any instance of a constituent of mine who is making an application for relief before the southern claims commission. It is not for constituents; it is not for that I am speaking; I am speaking as a matter of justice for men who have spent their money, I care not where they reside, under a law of Congress to get their cases prepared, who have already got them prepared for decision by this commission, and now to strike them down through political or sectional or any other kind of prejudice, it seems to me is going beyond the duty of the House.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that this commission may be allowed to go on and close up this business. Here are three thousand cases that ought to be decided. Something ought to be done with them. What are you going to do with them? If you put them before the Court of Claims it is altogether probable they will not be decided by that court for five years to come.

Gentlemen say, "Let them go; do nothing with them." Is that fair? Is it just? If these men had never begun their cases, then it might perhaps have done to make that argument; but since they have spent their money to prepare their cases, it seems to me an act of injustice to prevent the decision of them. These cases have been prepared under a law of Congress, to be tried before a commission created by Congress, and it seems to be only just to allow the commission to finish its work.

Mr. MANNING. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANNING. The gentleman said that I had remarked that the Court of Claims do not decide more than fifty or sixty cases in a year. I did say that the Court of Claims do not decide more than fifty or sixty cases; but the gentleman forgot that the court was only about two months out of the twelve engaged in that work. I do not mean to say the court could not do a great deal more work than that; therefore the statement of the gentleman that the cases could not be disposed of by that court if, to use his language, they were dumped into it, goes for naught, for it can do six times more work than it does.

Mr. ATKINS. According to the gentleman's own argument it is an inefficient court. I have made no charge against the Court of Claims, but the gentleman from Mississippi does make a charge of inefficiency against that court; and, granting the gentleman's charge is correct, I say these three thousand claimants never would have any chance to get their cases decided in a court that only decided fifty or sixty cases in a year.

Many MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to the substitute of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] for the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG.] The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the substitute by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That the cases thus transferred to the Court of Claims shall be subject to the same defense by the Government that could have been made if pending in said commission.

The question being put, there were—ayes 45, noes 82.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. YOUNG,] which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the causes now pending before the southern claims commission be, and the same are hereby, transferred to the Court of Claims, there to be determined by the principles of law and equity governing the decision of causes now before it; and that the southern claims commission be, and the same is hereby, abolished.

The question being put, there were—ayes 53, noes 107.

So the substitute was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment as follows:

That claimants who have claims pending before the southern claims commission which have not been finally disposed of shall be authorized to bring suit therefor in the Court of Claims, under the rules and according to the course of proceedings in said court, at any time within one year from the passage of this act.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I make the point of order that this amendment changes existing law and is not in the interest of economy.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. If the gentleman will hear me, I think I can convince him that it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentlemen on the point of order.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make some remarks about the amendment and let the Chair decide the point of order after I have done so.

It seems to me that if all or half that has been stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin, the gentleman from Ohio, and the gentleman from Indiana, is true, the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin is eminently proper. It has been stated by these gentlemen, and it is the fact, that this southern claims commission have been constantly in the habit of determining the validity of claims on testimony taken ex parte. It is charged by the gentleman from Wisconsin, I do not know with what truth, that this machinery has been used for political purposes; that the commission have decided in favor of this man or that man according to the party he belongs to, violating every rule of evidence and subverting every principle of law. That portion of the statement I subscribe to. There is no question but that in a great many cases these gentlemen have utterly ignored every consideration of law and every rule of evidence known to any court of justice in the civilized world.

Now, if it be true—and it cannot be questioned, for it has been admitted time and again by gentlemen on the floor—that the commission have decided cases pending before them upon testimony taken without notice to the plaintiff at all. Such a custom is a reproach to the administration of justice, and any court which has been guilty of such a subversion of law ought at once to be abolished. But I hold, sir, that there should be some remedy and some tribunal provided for men who have been unjustly dealt with by that commission, so that where cases have been determined improperly, in violation of law, they can have an opportunity of appearing before some other tribunal where justice can be done. I have heard in the course of this debate some singular legal propositions stated.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I do not yield to my colleague.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to the point of order that my colleague must confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. It is for the Chair to determine the point of order, and not for my colleague.

Mr. ATKINS. I have the right to rise and make the point of order on my colleague.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. But you have no right to decide it, though I know that the Committee on Appropriations, and especially its chairman, can do almost anything in this House.

Mr. ATKINS. And so can the committee of my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken; the gentleman from Tennessee will confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Then I will not argue the case any further, if it is already decided against me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS.] The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG.]

Mr. HOOKER. I offer the amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following:

Provided, That all causes now pending in said commission be, and are hereby, transferred to the district courts of the United States in the respective districts where the plaintiffs or claimants in said pending causes reside, which court shall proceed to try and adjudicate said causes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I make the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. HOOKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The amendment changes existing law, and is not in the line of retrenchment.

Mr. HOOKER. I would remark that the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] proposes to strike out the sections of the law, and it has not been objected to that it changes existing law. Now, the amendment which I offer to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] does not change existing law any more than the amendment itself does. It simply proposes to have a tribunal clothed with authority to pass upon these claims, and I think it should not be the Court of Claims, but that the authority should be vested in the district and circuit courts of the United States and that the suit should be instituted there rather than in a court which is remote from the residences of the parties and witnesses.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not undertake to answer the question as to whether the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] is obnoxious to the point of order. No such point of order was made, but the Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken on Mr. BRAGG's amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 55, noes 98.

Mr. STEVENSON, Mr. SPRINGER, and others called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, (thirty-one members voting therefor, being more than one-fifth of a quorum;) and Mr. BRAGG and Mr. ATKINS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 112.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOOKER. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the following:

For compensation of three investigating agents, at $6 per day when actually employed; also traveling expenses of agents.

Mr. WARNER. Is it in order for me to give notice that I shall call for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] in the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the gentleman has not that right.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. He has that right unless objection be made.

The CHAIRMAN. There can be no such right, as the amendment never goes to the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It can by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in the power of the committee to report an amendment to the House after it has been defeated in the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. But it may be moved in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course any member in the House will have a right to move an amendment provided he is not cut off by the previous question.

Mr. KEIFER. I make a point of order upon that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. My point of order is that the amendment changes existing law.

Mr. CLYMER. It reduces expenditures.

Mr. KEIFER. It may reduce expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not hesitate to overrule the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER,] for even if the amendment were obnoxious to that charge it certainly is germane.

Mr. HOOKER. I offer this amendment for the purpose of striking out that appropriating provision which proposes compensation for the secret agents of this commission who are sent out to take ex parte testimony in cases pending before it. They ought never to have been vested with the power to take evidence, except that power which pertains to all legal tribunals. They ought to have been required to conform to all the rules of law, and in answer to what has been said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] with reference to the adjudication by the Supreme Court of the United States and the Court of Claims, who have decided in conformity with law that where a pardon has once been given, whether general in its character or special in its nature, it restores the party to the attitude in which he stood. These commissioners acted specially under the law of 1871, which required primarily that before the party could have his standing in court he should establish his loyalty in order to be able to make his claim against the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to call the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi to the fact that that portion of the text of the bill to which the gentleman offers his amendment has already been stricken out by the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] on the day before yesterday.

Mr. HOOKER. If that is so I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. How many lines of the bill were stricken out?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment hitherto adopted as offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. YOUNG.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of six investigating agents at $5 per day, when actually employed; also traveling expenses of agents, fees and mileage to Government witnesses, cost of summoning Government witnesses, fees to commissioners for taking testimony, fees for abstracts and exemplifications of public records relating to claims and claimants, $6,000: Provided, That said agents shall give notice to claimants whose claims it is proposed to investigate of the time and place of taking testimony, who shall have the right to cross-examine every witness who may testify in behalf of the Government, and said agents shall also take, at the same time, the testimony of any and all witnesses who may be presented by the claimant, on his paying the expenses thereof; and all such testimony, both in behalf of the claimant and the Government, shall be taken under the laws and rules which usually govern the taking of testimony; and the judges of the southern claims commission shall prescribe and publish rules for the taking of the testimony, and shall provide in all cases for full and fair notice to be given of the time and place thereof.

Mr. HOOKER. That amendment accomplishes most that I desire to attain, though I would go further and wipe out all these agents entirely. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out from line 2065 to line 2085, both inclusive, (the three paragraphs relating to the southern claims commission,) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That any person who may have a claim against the United States of which the Court of Claims would not now have jurisdiction, but founded upon equity and justice, and not barred by any statute of limitations provided by any law of the United States, may file his bill in the Court of Claims of the United States, setting out the grounds of his claim and the relief desired by him; and the Attorney-General of the United States shall appear and plead thereto as provided for in other cases.

Any issue of fact joined upon such bill may be tried by the court as now provided for cases of which it has jurisdiction.

The court shall find the facts appearing from the testimony before them in each case, and shall report their findings to Congress, with their opinion as to the determination that should be made of such claim.

Congress shall not consider nor allow nor authorize the payment of any private claim not payable under existing laws until the same has been heard and reported to Congress by said Court of Claims, as herein provided.

All claims against the United States provided for by this act not prosecuted within six years from the passage of this section, or of the time when the same severally accrued, shall be barred, except that when the claimants are under legal disability to sue, the action must be brought within said six years, or within three years after such disability shall cease.

All acts and parts of acts establishing the southern claims commission, and all acts amendatory thereof, are hereby repealed. And all records, books, and papers of said commission, and cases pending therein, shall be transferred to the Court of Claims, to be disposed of by that court as other cases.

Mr. KEIFER. I raise the point of order on that amendment, that it changes existing law and does not retrench expenditures.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to be heard upon that point of order.

Mr. PRICE. And I wish to reserve the right to make another point of order after that one has been disposed of.

Mr. SPRINGER. This proposition abolishes entirely the southern claims commission. To that extent it does retrench expenditures, as the appropriation in the pending bill for that commission amounts to some $27,000. It therefore retrenches expenditures to the extent of $27,000 in the pending bill. It also retrenches expenditures in that it abolishes the court absolutely, so that it cannot hereafter be a charge upon the Government.

It also provides that the claims referred to shall be heard in the Court of Claims, and that that court shall consider the facts and report their findings to Congress. Congress then may or may not make an appropriation to pay them.

I desire to state further that the proposition which I have moved, except the repealing clause, is exactly in the words of the bill known as the "Potter bill," which in the last Congress passed this House under a suspension of the rules by a very large majority. That bill was for the purpose of removing from this House all private claims against the Government until they had been first passed upon by the Court of Claims.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the amendment of the gentleman let in these cases already barred by this act?

Mr. KEIFER. Undoubtedly it does, every one of them.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman is mistaken. It does not. I ask the Clerk to read the first clause of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That any person who may have a claim against the United States of which the Court of Claims would not now have jurisdiction, but founded upon equity and justice, and not barred by any statute of limitations provided by any law of the United States, &c.

Mr. KEIFER. The latter part of the amendment transfers all the cases to the Court of Claims, every one of them, whether barred or not.

Mr. SPRINGER. The cases pending in the southern claims commission would go there and be determined under the law that exists at the time. It is to be presumed that the cases now pending in the claims commission are such as that commission has jurisdiction to hear and determine. And only such as are now pending therein can be transferred to the Court of Claims under the amendment which I have proposed. I do not propose to repeal the statute of limitations as to any claim which is now barred.

Mr. KEIFER. I simply wish to press the point suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.] Another portion of this bill transfers to the Court of Claims for adjudication all the cases now pending before the southern claims commission.

As I have already stated to-day, if the southern claims commission is continued about five thousand of those cases will be barred; that is, if it is continued until they can make their report at the next session of Congress. So far no testimony has been taken in those five thousand cases; and the testimony not having been taken within the time allowed by law they are to be reported to the next Congress and thereafter barred. In about three thousand cases testimony has been taken and adjudication will be had.

Under this proposed amendment these five thousand cases which are now barred would be transferred to the Court of Claims without any limitation at all. That certainly changes existing law, and there is nothing in it to indicate that there would be any retrenchment, but upon the contrary it would revive a large number of claims which otherwise would be barred.

Mr. SPRINGER. What part of the amendment is it that gives jurisdiction over claims that the law does not now confer jurisdiction over and authorize the Court of Claims to try?

Mr. KEIFER. Under this amendment all claims would be referred to the Court of Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order. That the amendment would change existing law there is no doubt. The Chair does not think that anybody can tell what will be the effect of the amendment if agreed to in the way of retrenching expenditures. It certainly looks to the retrenchment of appropriations proposed by this bill to the extent of $27,000. The Chair prefers to submit the question to the judgment of the committee, deferring to its wisdom, and will not sustain the point of order. The Chair will now hear the point of order raised by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE.]

Mr. PRICE. My point of order is that the amendment proposes to strike out what has already been inserted by the committee, and that under the rule that is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that the amendment proposes to strike out only that which has been inserted by the committee.

Mr. PRICE. The paragraph extending from lines 2075 to 2081 inclusive was struck out and a new paragraph substituted. This amendment of the gentleman from Illinois proposes to strike out what the Committee of the Whole has inserted, and is clearly not in order. I think the Chair will not hesitate in deciding that it is not in order to strike out what has been inserted by the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the point made by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE.] But the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois proposes to strike out not only that which has been inserted by a vote of the committee, but two additional paragraphs, and this is in order. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, as I have already said, this amendment, except the repealing clause at the end, is in precisely the same words as the bill known as the "Potter bill," which at the last session of Congress was passed by this House under a suspension of the rules by a very large majority. In addition to the provisions of that bill, I have inserted at the close a clause repealing the existing law authorizing the southern claims commission, and transferring all the records, books, and papers of that commission to the Court of Claims, together with the cases now pending before the commission, to be disposed of by the Court of Claims in the same manner as other cases. Under this amendment those cases will be disposed of under the law as it exists when the court gets possession of them. The amendment does not confer jurisdiction as to any case which is now barred by any statutes of limitations. Hence the amendment will not revive the right to prosecute any claim which is now barred; but every such claim will still be barred. It is simply provided that all claims, not only southern claims, but every kind of claim against the United States, shall not hereafter be brought to this House, shall not hereafter be brought to the southern claims commission, but shall in the first instance go to the Court of Claims, which shall consider all such cases and report its findings to Congress with its opinion as to the determination that should be made of such claims. The amendment will, therefore, transfer all private cases from this tribunal (for it is a tribunal when it considers claims against the Government of the United States)—it will transfer all private cases from Congress to the Court of Claims, a tribunal created for the purpose of investigating such cases, a tribunal where both sides can be heard according to the rules of evidence and of law.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the determination of private claims in Congress. Of all tribunals under the sun for the adjudication of private claims, the Congress of the United States is the worst. It is unjust to the claimants, unjust to the Government, unjust to all the interests involved. I am opposed to allowing this body, which should be here for the purpose of considering general laws, to be engaged in considering little claims against the Government of the United States for losses sustained in the war or otherwise—claims which are considered and passed upon here upon ex parte testimony entirely. I prefer that claims of this kind should be barred entirely rather than that they should be longer considered by Congress. There were nearly ten thousand bills introduced in this House and the Senate during the last Congress. Nine-tenths of them were private bills, and not one bill in a hundred was ever reported upon by the committees. Will you longer trifle with claimants by offering them the Congress of the United States as the only tribunal where they may prosecute claims against the Government? To send an honest claim to Congress is practically a denial of justice to the claimant. Let us discontinue the unjust and demoralizing practice and send all claimants in the first instance to a court of competent jurisdiction. As for war claims, I am opposed to paying any more of them. But my amendment covers all claims against the Government, of whatever kind, nature, or description, except such as are now barred by law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the proposed amendment, by referring this class of cases to the Court of Claims or some other tribunal that is to report to Congress its findings upon the facts with its conclusions of law, would be one of the worst measures that could be placed upon our statute-books. Why, Mr. Chairman, if that court is simply to draw its conclusions of law and its conclusions of fact and then leave every question undecided, with a mere expression of opinion, throwing the whole determination of these cases upon Congress, what kind of a tribunal would such a court be? It would be perfectly idle to refer these cases to a court with no power to do anything beyond expressing an opinion. A court must act judicially upon the questions of law and of fact coming before it; and I ask whether it would be fair to any claimant to have his claim frittered away by any such process. The tribunal that analyzes the testimony, that deliberates upon the law, is the one that should decide the question, subject, if you please, to revision by any court that may be designated as a court of review. If I am wrong in my understanding of the amendment I ask the gentleman from Illinois to correct me. Am I wrong as to the provisions of this amendment?

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman is entirely wrong in regard to it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I am glad I have mistaken the purport of the amendment. Does the gentleman mean to say that I am wrong in my statement as to the effect of the amendment?

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand the gentleman to be entirely wrong as to the merits of this question, and I understood him to be discussing the merits.

Mr. HUMPHREY. As I understand, the amendment provides that these cases shall go to the Court of Claims, who are to report their finding upon the facts and the law to Congress for final disposition. Am I correct?

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the amendment be read again, and then the gentleman may understand it better.

The amendment was again read.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I find I am not mistaken as to the scope of this amendment. It is nearly the same, I believe, as the proposition called the "Potter bill," which I voted against at the last session. I have not misconstrued the amendment. It does empower the court to hear evidence and, if it is a question of damages, to take testimony and pass upon the amount of damages, find the facts and conclusions, and report those conclusions to Congress. I say it would be an anomaly to have a court perform that act of bringing its mind to bear upon legal questions of that character, and then send the judgment here to be finally disposed of.

Mr. BLOUNT. To make appropriations?

Mr. HUMPHREY. No, sir, not at all; but it simply provides that it shall report its findings to Congress. I say there is no provision in that act which allows the Court of Claims to pronounce judgment in any case, but it simply allows it to find the facts and draw its conclusions and report those conclusions to Congress. That is the whole scope of it.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. Is not the same provision authorizing the commission to report to Congress in the very law which the gentleman has voted to keep in existence?

Mr. HUMPHREY. No; that was a commission. The court passes upon the cases under the law as it now is, and the result is simply reported to Congress for appropriation.

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir; it has to be reported and acted upon in Congress. They have to approve of it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Do they not pronounce their judgment subject to the action of Congress to make appropriations?

Mr. BRAGG. It is referred to Congress, and by Congress referred to the appropriate committee, and Congress may alter the finding. They may change it in any particular. They may report adversely to the entire finding.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The very fault I have found is, that while it allows this Congress to review their action and modify or reverse the judgment of the Court of Claims under the law as it is now this does not allow that court to make any judgment, but simply to give an opinion and bring it to Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the difference between reporting findings as their judgment or giving their opinion to Congress—reporting to Congress the opinion they have formed, for example, that the Government owes A B a specific sum of money?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Why, the difference is this: when you have a court to render final judgment to be referred to this House for an appropriation, that is well enough; but when you have a commission or a court created to examine evidence, to compel that court, instead of passing judgment to refer it here to undergo review by Congress—I say if you do not allow that court to pronounce the conclusion to which it has come upon the facts and evidence before it, if you do not allow that judgment to be entered up, why then I would just as lief, if I had a claim, have it referred for judgment to the Fejee Islanders as to submit it in any such way. I say such a law and such a proceeding would be a disgrace to this Republic. This amendment should not be allowed to pass as it has been offered, and I will move as an amendment at the close of my remarks, if this is likely to pass into a law, that the Court of Claims shall pass judgment giving their conclusion on the law and facts——

Mr. BRAGG. Will my colleague allow me to read the law as it now is?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. I will read, then, the law as it now is:

> And on satisfactory evidence of the justice and validity of any claim the commission shall report their opinion in writing in each case, and shall certify the entire amount and value of property taken or used as aforesaid.

That is all the claims commission has a right to do; they render no judgment at all. But yet my colleague, with all his objection to that form of proceeding, has just voted to retain it in the law.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I say that it is subject to the review of Congress to the extent of the appropriation to be made by Congress to carry it out, but the amendment does not allow them to give judgment as to the facts.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise, Mr. Chairman, to oppose the amendment. The amendment I have offered so far as it relates to the findings of the court is nearly in the same words of the present law governing the claims commission.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Not quite.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is nearly in the same terms with the law which has been read by the gentleman from Wisconsin. He will please read that section of the statutes again, and we will see how nearly these two provisions are in the same words. I think it will appear that my friend from Wisconsin on the other side has been trying to draw a distinction without a difference.

Mr. BRAGG. I read the language of the statute:

> And upon satisfactory evidence of the justice and validity of any claim, the commissioners shall report their opinion in writing in each case, and shall certify the nature, amount, and value of the property taken, furnished, or used as aforesaid.

Mr. SPRINGER. And in the proposition I have offered, the words are these:

> The court shall find the facts appearing from the testimony before them in each case, and shall report their findings to Congress with their opinion as to the determination that should be made of such claim.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there is any difference under the sun between these two provisions, then I confess I cannot see it. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HUMPHREY] may see it; but I am sure the practice will be hereafter precisely the same in both cases.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, and Mr. REED rose.

Mr. ATKINS. I demand a vote.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order. An amendment to the amendment is already pending.

Mr. CONGER. Is there more than one amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HUMPHREY] to strike out the last word.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I withdraw it.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I understand that the practice with the Chair is to recognize the two sides alternately. Somebody should be recognized on this side, at least to-morrow or next day.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The gentleman from Michigan never has an opportunity to talk, and therefore I yield to him.

Mr. REED. It is not the gentleman from Michigan who claims the floor.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I do not yield to the gentleman from Maine. If the gentleman from Michigan does not avail himself of the privilege of the floor, I shall occupy it myself.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Michigan has not asked the floor for himself, but for me.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Then I yield to the good-natured gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. Now, I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that his amendment does not get rid of the immense difficulty he found himself struggling with when he offered it, that this thing must come finally for adjudication before a tremendously wicked tribunal, that does not do anybody justice. I do not know if Congress be open to that objection, but probably the gentleman's experience on election committees has given him that idea.

I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that his amendment does not meet the objection so ably urged by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to wit, that there is an immense mass of testimony that has been collected under the advice and by invitation of a law of Congress. I do not understand that the gentleman's amendment provides that that testimony can be used in the Court of Claims. In my judgment, the whole wording of the bill, taken together, will prevent that testimony being used, and hence gross injustice is to be done to a class of claimants.

Then, again, another objection, which seems to me to be very serious, is that this whole matter is to be taken from a commission which has had a great deal of experience in these matters and is amply qualified to give advice to Congress; for that, after all, is all that the commission or the Court of Claims under this amendment can do. I sincerely hope the matter will stand as it does now. Let this batch of business be cleared off and let the whole thing end. There is nothing binding on gentlemen who voted for this as an original bill. When it now comes in as an amendment it is an entirely different proposition, and one which, in my judgment, trifles with the subject instead of fairly and squarely meeting it. The sole object is to get some partisan advantage by pretending that one side or the other is in favor of southern claims. By southern claims are meant, in popular estimation, southern disloyal claims, which are barred not only by statute but by the practice of this House and the practice of civilized nations all over the world.

But this is an act of the American Congress in favor of its loyal citizens, and it should be maintained, inasmuch as we have entered upon it, no matter what anybody might think a priori, and it should be maintained and carried out in its integrity. The gentlemen forming the majority of the Committee on Appropriations might probably have been against it originally, but they now support it on account of its fairness as it stands under all the circumstances; and I think the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has presented as strong reasons why this amendment should be rejected as he has why the other amendment which was rejected should be.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] by striking out these words:

> And not barred by any statute of limitations provided by any law of the United States.

I desire to be heard on the amendment I have offered. When that bill was before Congress formerly I took occasion to examine it, and I found it was a very cunningly-worded instrument indeed. Upon its face it is exceedingly fair. Its practical application, however, would be to exclude every claim now pending before the Court of Claims, before the Quartermaster-General's Department, and before Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is not the purpose of it.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. That is the effect of it. I have not the statute before me, but I warn gentlemen who have any interest in maintaining the faith of the Government to claimants against voting for that bill, because it will exclude by its legal effect almost every claim against the Government.

Now, to another branch of the subject. I beg to disabuse the minds of the House, and especially of my friend from Maine, [Mr. REED,] of the misapprehension under which they are laboring. There are no disloyal people in the country now. There are no disloyal people in the South. We are all loyal. It has been so pronounced by our action upon this floor, the conduct of the southern people since the war, and by the decisions of the highest judicial tribunal of the country.

Whatever gentlemen may say to the contrary, it is a solemnly adjudicated fact that there is no disloyalty now in all this country, either North or South.

The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly declared that persons who had borne arms against the Government, and who had afterward taken the oath of allegiance under the proclamation of President Lincoln of 2d July, 1863, were thereby restored to all their rights of citizenship in person and property. Subsequently, under the proclamations of President Johnson, the Supreme Court has declared that every citizen of the Government was relieved of every penalty incurred by the war and restored to all the rights enjoyed before, except as to property in slaves.

Mr. WARNER. Does the gentleman mean to say that it is the decision of the court that a man who fought on the confederate side may, under the proclamations referred to, bring in a claim against the Government for property lost or destroyed in the war?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. That is exactly the decision. That is the very identical question which the Supreme Court has decided in more than one noted case, that the operation and the legal effect of President Johnson's proclamations of amnesty and pardon were to restore to every man, whatever his standing may have been during the civil war, all the rights of an American citizen, both in person and property. That is the fixed, established law of the land to-day so far as it can be made so by the adjudication of the highest tribunal in the country.

Mr. WARNER. That is abhorrent to every principle of right, as well as opposed to all settled principles of the laws of war or international law.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Now let me go a little further. I am utterly opposed to the further continuance of the southern claims commission. It is a farce. I have nothing unkind to say about the judges of that court, but I say that the court as constituted, from the way in which business is conducted there according to the testimony of gentlemen who are its friends, ought to be abolished and some better court substituted in its stead.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, in justice to myself I desire to say a few words. It was said upon the floor of this House a few moments since that it was left to these days of civilization for a Union soldier to oppose the just claims of Union soldiers during the war.

If that remark was intended to apply to me I say to this committee as a Union soldier that while I have no objection to the claims of Union soldiers, the objection which I was urging was to the machinery established by the party that par excellence claims to be the friends of the Union soldiers, that refused to allow the Quartermaster's Department, from its own muster-rolls in the War Department, to determine who were Union soldiers and settle with Union soldiers for supplies furnished to the Government to aid in carrying on the war. These pretended friends of the Union soldier saw fit to establish this machinery, instead of settling with the Union soldiers as they ought, and have placed him on the same footing with those who were not Union soldiers and compelled him to resort to the same machinery resorted to by others, when by their own records the Department could have settled and adjusted their accounts with him promptly and speedily.

Let me say a word upon another question. It is said that the views I hold are extreme. I desire to call attention to the report of the committee of this House made in 1866, and it was the report of the committee of which I now have the honor to be chairman—the Committee on War Claims. It would seem that this report was drawn by a man of prophetic vision, who saw coming upon the country what has since happened. The Committee of Claims of this House in 1866 declared:

> In view of the magnitude of these losses, as well as the magnitude of the public debt and the thousand abuses necessarily resulting from an attempt to satisfy these claims, in the words of Vattel, "the thing is utterly impracticable and ought not to be encouraged."
> It may be suggested that a distinction should be made between losses arising out of the destruction of property incident to the ravages of war and damages growing out of the appropriation of property for the uses of the Army.
>
> Without controverting the propriety of this distinction, so far as citizens of the loyal States are concerned, it is suggested that it will be dangerous and inexpedient to apply it to claims coming from States lately in rebellion. It will be difficult to determine with any sufficient degree of certainty the question of individual loyalty; and if it be established as a rule that property taken from loyal citizens in rebellious States for military supplies shall be paid for, it may be conceded that every claimant will find some proof to present of his devotion and suffering in the cause of the Government.
> * * * * * * *
> Appeals to our sympathy, humanity, and benevolence are not easily resisted, and it is a credit to human nature that we are so constituted as to be accessible to such appeals.
> It is to be remembered, however, that such appeals ought not to induce and cannot authorize us to levy extraordinary taxation upon our constituents in order to gratify our charitable impulses. We are not almoners merely for the nation, and have no just right to impose increased taxation in order to gratify our feelings of benevolence, nor to establish principles of abstract justice and equity, when there is no rule or law requiring it, and particularly when the attempt is to be attended with great uncertainty and be subjected to innumerable impositions and frauds.—House Report, 10, first session Thirty-ninth Congress.

That was embraced in a report of the committee unanimously sent to the House, signed by members of both political parties and representing the House and this committee. Had that report been adopted and acted on instead of these political make-shifts being adopted we should have been relieved from these continued vexatious claims by people who pretend to have been loyal, and we should have saved I cannot say how much; but when Secretary Sherman said that he had paid over one hundred millions for claims of this description, I believe he failed to give half the amount paid from the Treasury for the gratification of these sympathetic impulses.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on this proposition.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me before the committee rises to make one statement?

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly I will.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] referred to my course in contested-election cases in this House. I do not know what the gentleman means by that remark.

Mr. REED. I will tell you if you want me to do it.

Mr. SPRINGER. My work on that committee has been a labor of love and I am gratified to state that every case I have reported has been adopted by the House and the finding of the committee has become the act of the House itself, so that if there is anything wrong about it the gentleman should hold the House responsible and not me.

Mr. REED. That is precisely what I spoke against, the injustice of the House in agreeing with the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then the gentleman's remarks should be directed to the House and not to me individually.

Mr. REED. They were directed to both.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I will take my share of the responsibility. Now, one word in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HUMPHREY.] He declaimed very eloquently against the amendment I have offered. I have before me the RECORD of the last Congress; and on page 4823, when the "Potter bill" was put upon its passage, in precisely the same words in which I moved this amendment except the repealing clause, the gentleman is found recorded as voting in the affirmative. I also find, among others, the name of my aimiable friend from Maine, [Mr. REED.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. When was the bill passed?

Mr. SPRINGER. On the 18th day of June, 1878, in the last Congress; and the gentleman will find his name recorded in the affirmative on page 4823 of the RECORD.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I voted against it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman's name is recorded in the affirmative, and I am not responsible for any error in the RECORD. He may amend the RECORD, but until he does that he must be judged by the record.

Mr. FRYE. What bill is it to which the gentleman refers? The Potter bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. Was there not a provision contained in that bill in relation to loyalty which is not contained in the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. SPRINGER. My amendment is, in hæc verba, the Potter bill, except the repealing clause at the end.

Mr. CONGER. Does not the gentleman remember that an amendment was put in the bill confining the provisions of the bill to those who remained loyal during the war, and the gentleman has either intentionally or accidentally omitted from his amendment that which made us willing to adopt the bill to which he refers.

If he has forgotten it, and it is to be charged upon his ignorance, then I will excuse him. If he has done it intentionally, then he does a great wrong to himself and to us.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have a copy of the Potter bill here in my hand and it is the same text of my amendment, and at the bottom of it I find the following:

> Passed the House of Representatives June 17, 1878.
> Attest: GEO. M. ADAMS, Clerk.

Mr. CONGER. The RECORD will show what the amendment was.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman will take the RECORD I hold in my hand, and also the amendment I have offered, and after the adjournment of the House have the Clerk compare them, he will find that my amendment is in precisely the same words of the Potter bill passed in June last.

Mr. REED. Was there any reference to the southern claims commission in that bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have stated that that was not in it. But the part of it referred to by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] and objected to by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HUMPHREY] is exactly as it is in my amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I desire to state that at the time this bill passed, my colleague [Governor POUND] and myself discussed the matter. I voted against the bill and he voted for it. He said to me, "You have voted right, and I think I ought to have voted the same way"—or some such expression as that. I desire to make this statement because my colleague will bear me out in my assertion that I voted against the bill.

Mr. POUND. The statement of my colleague [Mr. HUMPHREY] is correct.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I am glad I gave the gentleman an opportunity to correct the RECORD.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED. I desire to state that I voted for the bill last year, which had in it no reference to the southern claims commission. I anticipated this line of argument on the part of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] in the remark I made which was that this is an entirely different proposition; that the proposition presented as an amendment by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is not what was presented to the House last year by the gentleman from New York, Mr. Potter. I think it was a pretty heavy strain upon us to vote for the proposition as originally presented, and a great deal heavier for us to vote for the one presented now.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that when the House shall again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, all debate upon the pending paragraphs and amendments thereto shall be closed in ten minutes, five minutes on each side.

Mr. SPRINGER. Pending that motion, I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. And, pending the two motions, the Chair desires to lay before the House a communication from the Clerk.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have been accused of having palmed off on this House as a bill which passed it last year something which is entirely different from that bill, and I have moved to adjourn in order that members may examine the facts in the mean time.

Mr. CONGER. That is not the proposition; it is that this is not the Potter bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is precisely the Potter bill except the repealing clause. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] who now sits by me, has just this moment compared the bill with the amendment, and they are precisely the same, except the repealing clause of the amendment.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following:

Very respectfully,

GEO. M. ADAMS, Clerk.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that these papers transmitted to the House by the Clerk be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING TESTIMONY IN ELECTION CONTESTS.

Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be authorized to have printed for its use any testimony it may deem necessary relative to contested-election cases before said committee.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I suggest as a query whether it would not be well to authorize the Committee of Elections to sit during the recess of Congress, and get business ready, so that these election contests may be decided at the earliest possible day.

The SPEAKER. That suggestion is a matter for the consideration of the committee.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. TALBOTT for the withdrawal from the files of the House of papers in the case of B. S. James, no adverse report having been made.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] moves that the House now adjourn. That motion has priority over the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] to limit debate in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ATKINS. My motion, I presume, will come up in the morning.

The motion of Mr. SPRINGER was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. GARLAND asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 435) to amend sections 1417, 1418, 1419, 1420, and 1624 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 437) to provide for the establishment of steamship mail service between the United States and Brazil; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 438) to provide for the disposition of a portion of the Fort Hays military reservation, in the State of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 439) for the relief of John S. Friend; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 440) granting a pension to David L. Payne; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 441) to prevent frauds in the entry of lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOAR asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 442) for the relief of Henry Waterman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Patents.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. SAULSBURY, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be authorized to employ a stenographer whenever they shall deem it necessary in any hearing before them.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be authorized to have printed for its use the arguments before it in the case of Spofford against Kellogg relative to a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, with such evidence, papers, and documents relative to the case as it may deem proper.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To what does the word "evidence" refer?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Only evidence that shall be taken by the committee under the authority of the Senate, hereafter to be asked.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the resolution go over, if that is what is meant by "evidence." Before the case that the Senate has once decided is to be reopened for evidence, I should be glad to hear the Committee on Privileges and Elections upon the subject.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The resolution does not propose to reopen the case for evidence. That question is not now before us.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I say it is only to print such evidence as may be taken by the authority of the Senate hereafter to be given. The question as to the taking of testimony, as to whether any and what evidence shall be taken, is not now before us.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the resolution lie over for the present. I should like to look at it a little.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will say to the Senator that the resolution does not include that question at all, as he will see if he will look at it.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to my honorable friend from Georgia to let the resolution read, "to print the arguments and other proceedings." That will cover everything.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have no objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that form.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Let it read, "such other proceedings as it may deem proper."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Striking out the word "evidence."

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Striking out the words "evidence, papers, and documents," and inserting "with such proceedings as it may deem proper."

Mr. EDMUNDS. "Their other proceedings."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say in reference to the suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont, that the case referred to in the resolution has been submitted to the consideration of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I suppose that it is competent for the committee to proceed with the consideration of that question according to its own judgment of what is right and proper. Therefore I do not see why there should be any objection to the resolution as first offered by the Senator from Georgia. I cannot understand that the committe is under the guidance of the Senate as to the manner in which it shall proceed to investigate any matter which is committed to it. I do not think, therefore, the objection of the Senator from Vermont is a pertinent objection at all, because it is competent for that committee, having had the question referred to them, to proceed with it, in my judgment, according to their own determination of what is right and proper in the matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, far be it from me to doubt that the Committee on Privileges and Elections will do anything else than what they think will be right and proper. It would be shocking to my sense of propriety to even allow myself to suspect for a moment that that would occur. But I must beg leave of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, while we are in this Chamber, to do what I think is right and proper as far as my vote and objection go. I believe that subject has not been committed to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and so I find it right and proper when my opinion and judgment as one member of this body is asked, and my consent and agreement to a particular resolution, to say something about it. If I have got over the line about that, I shall get back when I am satisfied that I am over.

The Senator from Georgia has explained that the object is not to foreclose or to open any question, but simply, as he now explains, to have whatever proceedings the committee take printed. To that I have not the slightest objection, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of this resolution as modified? Is there objection? It requires unanimous consent.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be authorized to have printed for its use the arguments before it in the case of Spofford against Kellogg relative to a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, with such other proceedings in relation to the case as it may deem proper.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) relating to the organization of the National Board of Health.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This closes the business of the morning hour, and the Chair understands that there are no resolutions on the Calendar except two that were laid on the table to be specially called up. The unfinished business is the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and the pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] which will now be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of section 6 the following:

And any military, naval, or civil officer, or any other person, who shall, except for the purposes herein named, appear armed with a deadly weapon of any description, either concealed or displayed, within a mile of any polling place where a general or special election for Representative to Congress is being held, shall, on conviction, be punished with a fine not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or with imprisonment for a period not less than six months nor more than five years, or with both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon this question the Senator from Kentucky on the right of the Chair [Mr. BECK] has the floor.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I had in a somewhat disconnected way yesterday answered as best I could some of the arguments presented by the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and had endeavored to present in part my own views on the pending question. When I closed I had tried to show that the democratic party were not responsible altogether, nor even in great part, for many of the charges which are made, and justly made all over the world, against the republican party for its military usurpations, its usurpations, and its general want of fitness to rule a free people. I showed that those charges had been made and repeated in the most emphatic manner by men who had been trusted as the recognized leaders of that party organization. I had read what was said at Cincinnati by the president of the convention, and in a solemn address to the people, and was about to proceed to read, as I will do now before I take up the line of my general argument, from a very distinguished source, a Senator in this Chamber who did me the honor some weeks ago to read a portion of a speech that I had made, and as to which I happened to say, perhaps improperly, that that was about the best part of the speech he had made. I shall read a portion of his now, which I know will be the best part of what I shall say to-day. Mr. HOAR, the Senator from Massachusetts, in the celebrated Belknap case, said, addressing the Senate as a manager on the part of the House:

My own public life has been a very brief and insignificant one, extending little beyond the duration of a single term of senatorial office; but in that brief period I have seen five judges of a high court of the United States driven from office by threats of impeachment for corruption or maladministration. I have heard the taunt, from friendliest lips, that when the United States presented herself in the East to take part with the civilized world in generous competition in the arts of life, the only product of her institutions in which she surpassed all others beyond question was her corruption. I have seen in the State in the Union foremost in power and wealth four judges of her courts impeached for corruption, and the political administration of her chief city become a disgrace and a by-word throughout the world. I have seen the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House, now a distinguished member of this court, rise in his place and demand the expulsion of four of his associates for making sale of their official privilege of selecting the youths to be educated at our great military school. When the greatest railroad of the world, binding together the continent and uniting the two great seas which wash our shores, was finished, I have seen our national triumph and exaltation turned to bitterness and shame by the unanimous reports of three committees of Congress—two of the House and one here—that every step of that mighty enterprise had been taken in fraud. I have heard in highest places the shameless doctrine avowed by men grown old in public office that the true way by which power should be gained in the Republic is to bribe the people with the offices created for their service, and the true end for which it should be used when gained is the promotion of selfish ambition and the gratification of personal revenge. I have heard that suspicion haunts the footsteps of the trusted companions of the President.

These things have passed into history. The Hallam or the Tacitus or the Sismondi or the Macaulay who writes the annals of our time will record them with his inexorable pen. And now, when a high Cabinet officer, the constitutional adviser of the Executive, flees from office before charges of corruption, shall the historian add that the Senate treated the demand of the people for its judgment of condemnation as a farce and laid down its high functions before the sophistries and jeers of the criminal lawyer? Shall he speculate about the petty political calculations as to the effect on one party or the other which induced his judges to connive at the escape of the great public criminal? Or, on the other hand, shall he close the chapter by narrating how these things were detected, reformed, and punished by constitutional processes which the wisdom of our fathers devised for us, and the virtue and purity of the people found their vindication in the justice of the Senate?

These references and extracts I think remove any foundation for the intimation that the democratic party in passing this bill, saying that soldiers shall not be kept at the polls, or seeking the repeal of the clause we are now asking Congress to repeal and the President to approve the repeal of, is done in any spirit at all comparable in bitterness to the spirit that called forth the denunciations manifested by the leading men of the republican party. I believe all that is or has been said against that party. I prefer, however, to prove their guilt by their own loyal witnesses, and I have done so sufficiently for the purposes of this debate. I propose to pay a little more attention than I was able to do yesterday, if I am allowed to go on connectedly, to what was said by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts by whom I was arraigned a week or two ago with some severity. He introduced the following resolution at the beginning of this session:

Resolved, That the refusal by one House of Congress to make necessary provision for the support of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, and for the defense of the country, except upon condition that the other House and the President shall give their assent to legislation which they disapprove, and the refusal by Congress to make such provision, except upon condition that the President shall give such assent, are unconstitutional, revolutionary, and, if persisted in, must lead to the overthrow of constitutional government and the destruction of the national life.

And he seemed to think that my statement made in the closing hours of the last session required or at least justified its introduction.

Mr. President, he might as well have written his resolution thus:

Resolved, That the refusal by the President to approve necessary provisions for the support of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, and for the defense of the country, which had been agreed to by both Houses of Congress, except upon condition that they should frame their bills to suit his views and abandon their right to repeal obnoxious laws, and the refusal by the President to approve such provisions except upon condition that Congress shall surrender its right to determine in what form bills shall pass to the President for signature, is unconstitutional, revolutionary, and, if persisted in, must lead to the overthrow of constitutional government and the destruction of the national life.

The one conundrum would be just as good as the other. We have presented no such proposition in either aspect and have not sought to arraign anybody. We have presented this proposition in the bill now before the Senate, and that is all we have done up to this time:

SEC. 6. That section 2002 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States: Provided, That nothing contained in this section, as now amended, shall be held or deemed to abridge or affect the duty or power of the President of the United States, under section 5297 of the Revised Statutes, enacted under and to enable the United States to comply with section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, on application of the Legislature or executive, as provided for in said section."

And that section 5528 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years."

That is all the democratic party propose in the bill before the Senate. They are not proposing either to coerce the President or to assume that he is seeking to coerce them, nor are they taking up or seeking to impose upon him any revolutionary measures, nor are they depriving him of any power to use the Army for any constitutional purpose; but on the contrary, to exclude any such conclusion, they have again, in the very face of the bill, reiterated that they intend to give him the power that the Constitution gives him and that the laws passed in accordance with it give him when he is asked to intervene by the Legislature of any State, or by its governor when the Legislature cannot be convened, to use the troops of the United States wherever they are needed. All that we propose to do is to say, you shall not, as was done in 1876 by the military orders I read yesterday, call troops that the Congress of the United States have said shall be stationed on the frontier to guard against Indian hostilities, or at points where invasion from abroad or domestic insurrection may threaten, merely for political purposes, to place them around the polls in States that are fully organized with all their rights guaranteed, their courts open, and their machinery working in harmony, without application from the Legislature or the governor and against their will. We insist that no authority shall send troops there, and that we will not take the money collected from the tax-payers of the country and appropriate it for any such purpose, nor will we authorize the President nor permit any deputy marshals under him so to use the Army of the United States. If there is revolution in that, gentlemen may make the most of it.

But, sir, bad as the action in the past has been, it is not so much because of that action that I am desirous to see this bill passed and this limitation upon the use of the Army placed upon the statute-book. I know that while it was inserted in the statutes for the first time in the history of this country, or of any other civilized country in the last two hundred years that I know of, certainly in England or America, that troops should be sent in time of peace to the polls, it was inserted in time of war on the motion of Mr. Pomery, of Kansas, and was acquiesced in because it removed a still greater evil than even that could be; it was acquiesced in because at that time war was flagrant, because at that time there were serious disturbances in several States, and because Mr. Pomeroy called attention to the fact that in Kansas years before it had been needed, and Federal protection might again become necessary somewhere in the then anomalous condition of affairs. Republican Senators now, after fourteen years of peace, are not only anxious to keep the provision that was accepted in 1865 to meet an anomalous condition of affairs, to meet a condition in time of actual war which was liable to change every day, and not intended for a time of peace, but they are more anxious to maintain it now than they were to enact it then, although they are forced to admit that there is not a State anywhere in the Union where a single hostile arm is raised against the authority of the United States, nor has there been since the confederates laid down their arms at Appomattox.

Hallam, the great historian of the Middle Ages, said briefly but clearly:

We find in the history of all usurping governments, time changes anomaly into system and injury into right. Examples beget custom, and custom ripens into law, and the doubtful precedents of one generation become the fundamental maxims of another.

Because the democratic party do not intend to allow a vicious and anomalous precedent which was fastened upon the country in time of trouble to become one of the fundamental maxims of the Government; because we now, at the very earliest moment when we have the power in both Houses, backed by our constituency and backed as we will be by the whole American people when they understand the question, seek to relieve the statute-book of that infamous provision which exists now, we are accused of revolutionary designs.

I know that it is not the actual grievance always that determines the necessity for the repeal of laws. Bad practices and precedents are brought up before the eyes of the country, and they are told, "You did this and you submitted to that, and this is only a step in the same direction; and this is justified and warranted by what you did then," just as we are told now and taunted with the fact, and abused here and elsewhere, because gentlemen say that in 1865 we consented that this provision should become law and that democrats voted for the bill with it so inserted, and therefore we are now false to ourselves, revolutionists against the Government, if we dare, fourteen years afterward, in a changed condition of things, to do away with a bad provision of law that necessity forced upon us at the time it was submitted to.

It was not the pressure of the taxation on America that caused the Revolution. The British government time and again offered to repeal, and did repeal, some of the laws of which the colonists complained, but it was the bad principle they attempted to establish over them that made the men of America rise and assert their ancient rights and privileges under the British constitution. In a great speech made in Parliament by Mr. Burke, in March, 1773, he illustrated this state of things well:

In other countries—

Said Mr. Burke—

the people, more simple and of a less mercurial cast, judge of an ill principle in government only by an actual grievance; here they anticipate the evil, and judge of the pressure of the grievance by the badness of the principle. They augur misgovernment at a distance, and snuff the approach of tyranny in every tainted breeze.

What was so well said by Mr. Burke of the men of the Revolution I hope can be said as truly of their descendants now, and that they will see to it that principles which are bad and which are used for bad purposes and may be used for still worse purposes in the future shall not be held over the heads of their children or their children's children, but shall be wiped out of the statute-books at the earliest possible moment and all the ancient rights and liberties of the people maintained.

Much was said about precedents by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in a speech delivered some time ago, very well said, but it seemed to me that he had looked carelessly into English history if he was prepared to assert before the American Congress that the Commons of England had never withheld supplies in order to obtain a redress of grievances, that they had only quarreled with the King about the money necessary to carry out and sustain his prerogative and sometimes found fault because of his extravagance in the disposition of the money they gave him. I turned to one of England's great historians, Macaulay, and looked at some of his statements in regard to it. They are not long, and I shall be obliged to trouble the Senate with reading some of them in order to illustrate what I mean to say.

When Charles I came to the throne Macaulay says he began his reign by endeavoring to establish a standing army. He was in this making attacks on the ancient rights and privileges of the House of Commons. He called them together. Let me read the words of the historian:

And now began that hazardous game on which were staked the destinies of the English people. It was played on the side of the House of Commons with keenness, but with admirable dexterity, coolness, and perseverance. Great statesmen, who looked far behind them and far before them, were at the head of that assembly. They were resolved to place the King in such a situation that he must either conduct the administration in conformity with the wishes of his Parliament or make outrageous attacks on the most sacred principles of the constitution. They accordingly doled out supplies to him very sparingly. He found that he must govern either in harmony with the House of Commons or in defiance of all law. His choice was soon made. He dissolved his first Parliament and levied taxes by his own authority. He convoked a second Parliament, and found it more intractable than the first. He again resorted to the expedient of dissolution, raised fresh taxes without any show of legal right, and threw the chiefs of the opposition into prison. At the same time a new grievance, which the peculiar feelings and habits of the English nation made insupportably painful, and which seemed to all discerning men to be of fearful augury, excited general discontent and alarm. Companies of soldiers were billeted on the people, and martial law was in some places substituted for the ancient jurisprudence of the realm.

The king called a third Parliament, and soon perceived that the opposition was stronger and fiercer than ever. He now determined on a change of tactics. Instead of opposing an inflexible resistance to the demands of the Commons, he, after much altercation and many evasions, agreed to a compromise which, if he had faithfully adhered to it, would have averted a long series of calamities. The Parliament granted an ample supply. The king ratified, in the most solemn manner, that celebrated law which is known by the name of the Petition of Right, and which is the second great charter of the liberties of England. By ratifying that law he bound himself never again to raise money without the consent of the houses, never again to imprison any person except in due course of law, and never again to subject his people to the jurisdiction of courts-martial.—Macaulay's History of England, volume 1, pages 78, 79.

He broke all those promises. Thomas Wentworth, his prime minister, was a man of ability. He created him Earl of Strafford. He was the king's chief adviser. He observed what was doing in continental nations. Looking at what Louis XIV and the monarchs of continental Europe were doing he determined to have a standing army at all hazards. There being an ancient custom whereby certain portions of the people were required to provide ships to guard against invasion, he converted that privilege into demanding ship-money, and he endeavored in every form to coerce the people into furnishing supplies. They would not consent. The king established courts to coerce them.

The historian continues:

Foremost among these courts in power and in infamy were the star chamber and the high commission, the former a political, the latter a religious inquisition. Neither was a part of the old constitution of England.

In short, history shows that it was the struggle between kingly prerogatives and the rights of the Commons of England that brought Charles to the block and Strafford to the block and that re-established the old Magna Charta in the form of the Petition of Right, which set forth all the rights Englishmen insisted that they ought to have, before the Commons would grant the King any supplies; they held that power over him. He was beheaded because he would not honestly carry out what he had promised to maintain and protect in that regard. Tell me that the Commons of England never withheld supplies because grievances were not redressed, in the face of such facts as these! Was Charles I beheaded, was Strafford beheaded, were the ministry driven into exile, was the Commonwealth established, was Cromwell brought into power, was John Hampden's determined resistance to tyranny all because of some disagreement as to some personal claim for money for private use asserted by the king, and was there no such effort made for redress of grievances as is claimed by us? No! James succeeded Charles II, and he, too, endeavored to establish a regular army.

Macaulay says in regard to that effort, speaking of the action of the Commons:

They harangued, however, with some force on the great superiority of a regular army to a militia. One of them tauntingly asked whether the defense of the kingdom was to be intrusted to the beef-eaters. Another said that he should be glad to know how the Devonshire train-bands, who had fled in confusion before Monmouth's scythemen, would have faced the household of Louis. But these arguments had little effect on cavaliers who still remembered with bitterness the stern rule of the Protector. The general feeling was forcibly expressed by the first of the tory country gentlemen of England, Edward Seymour. He admitted that the militia was not in a satisfactory state, but maintained that it might be remodeled. The remodeling might require money, but, for his own part, he would rather give a million to keep up a force from which he had nothing to fear than half a million to keep up a force of which he must ever be afraid. Let the train-bands be disciplined, let the navy be strengthened, and the country would be secure. A standing army was at best a mere drain on the public resources. The soldier was withdrawn from all useful labor. He produced nothing, he consumed the fruits of the industry of other men, and he domineered over those by whom he was supported. But the nation was now threatened not only with a standing army, but with a popish standing army; with a standing army officered by men who might be very amiable and honorable, but who were on principle enemies to the constitution of the realm.

Thus, first one commoner and then another denied that the king had any right to demand money to maintain an army.

They contended—

that the reasonable and constitutional practice was to grant no money till grievances had been redressed, and that there would be an end of this practice if the house thought itself bound servilely to follow the order in which matters were mentioned by the king from the throne.

A long discussion followed. Tellers were had in the house. The king was defeated. The Commons were called to Whitehall and lectured. Again they met, and again they defeated him by a larger majority than before; they withheld his supplies until he yielded to their demands. That is Macaulay's statement of it. And again, speaking of the power of the Commons over the Lords, he says before they would place any supplies into the hands of William after James had been driven from the kingdom, they framed what was known as the Declaration of Right, which Macaulay thus describes:

The declaration began by recapitulating the crimes and errors which had made a revolution necessary. James had invaded the province of the legislature; had treated modest petitioning as a crime; had oppressed the church by means of an illegal tribunal; had, without the consent of Parliament, levied taxes and maintained a standing army in time of peace; had violated the freedom of election, and perverted the course of justice.

That is precisely what is being done under our laws now—violating the freedom of State elections, maintaining armies to act as a constabulary force, and perverting and degrading the courts of justice by incorporating surreptitiously into the Revised Statutes, or by accident, if you please, a repealed law that deprives men in eleven States of the right of an honest trial by jury.

The historian continues:

Proceedings which could lawfully be questioned only in Parliament had been made subjects of prosecution in the King's Bench. Partial and corrupt juries had been returned. Excessive bail had been required from prisoners; excessive fines had been imposed; barbarous and unusual punishments had been inflicted.

All the demands contained in that great Declaration of Right William had to pledge himself to maintain as the ancient rights and liberties of the people, and to agree that he would secure them against any interruptions of them, or any further exactions in violation of them, before they would allow him any supplies or even recognize him as their ruler. From his time to this there never has been a veto by an English sovereign of any act of Parliament. Since 1693, now nearly two hundred years ago, no English sovereign has ever dared to veto an act of Parliament, much less as my friend from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] suggests, has he attempted to veto the repeal of an obnoxious law. William was required to establish a ministry; but before I allude to that, speaking of the coercion of the House of Commons over the Lords, which the Senator from Massachusetts said had never been exerted as he claims the lower House of Congress at the last session tried to coerce this body, the historian says that when the land tax was sought to be imposed in the time of William for the purpose of raising money, the House of Commons appointed commissioners to value all the land belonging to the nobility. The nobility insisted that they should have a right to have men of their own class as appraisers. All they asked was that they should have a hearing as to the valuation to be put upon their property. The Commons said, "No; you have nothing to do with the imposition of taxes and nothing to do with the manner in which they shall be imposed." Macaulay says that an exciting debate took place. I quote:

A strong party among the Lords was obstinate. Mulgrove spoke at great length against the pretensions of the plebeians. He told his brethren that if they gave way they would abdicate that authority which had belonged to the baronage of England ever since the foundation of the monarchy, and that they would have nothing left of their old greatness except their coronets and ermines. Burnet says that this speech was the finest that he ever heard in Parliament, and Burnet was undoubtedly a good judge of speaking, and was neither partial to Mulgrove nor zealous for the privileges of the aristocracy. The orator, however, though he charmed his hearers, did not succeed in convincing them. Most of them shrank from a conflict in which they would have had against them the Commons united as one man, and the King, who in case of necessity would undoubtedly have created fifty peers rather than have suffered the land-tax bill to be lost.—Macaulay's History of England, volume 4, pages 286 and 287.

Was not that coercion upon the Lords? They yielded, and from that day to this the Lords have never ventured even to amend a tax bill or a bill imposing penalties, nor have they been allowed to intervene in any way, nor has the King ever dared to tell the Commons how or in what way or in what form they shall lay their bills before him or how they shall impose taxes or grant supplies. Not only in William's time, but on the passage of the reform bill and the Catholic emancipation bill, the prime ministers of England have gone to the House of Lords and have given them to understand that their ancient privileges were in danger, that His Majesty or Her Majesty, as the case might be, stood prepared to appoint as many new lords as would overrule them if they dared to resist the action of the House of Commons in passing the bills the Commons demanded. That looks to me like coercion; worse than anything the lower House of Congress has ever thought of. When William established his ministry, Macaulay says that the House found out a happy way of controlling the country:

The ministry is, in fact, a committee of leading members of the two houses. It is nominated by the Crown; but it consists exclusively of statesmen whose opinions on the pressing questions of the time agree, in the main, with the opinions of the majority of the House of Commons. Among the members of this committee are distributed the great departments of the administration. Each minister conducts the ordinary business of his own office without reference to his colleagues. But the most important business of every office, and especially such business as is likely to be the subject of discussion in Parliament, is brought under the consideration of the whole ministry. In Parliament the ministers are bound to act as one man on all questions relating to the executive government. If one of them dissents from the rest on a question too important to admit of compromise, it is his duty to retire. While the ministers retain the confidence of the parliamentary majority—that majority supports them against opposition, and rejects every motion which reflects on them or is likely to embarrass them. If they forfeit that confidence, if the parliamentary majority is dissatisfied with the way in which patronage is distributed, with the way in which the prerogative of mercy is used, with the conduct of foreign affairs, with the conduct of a war, the remedy is simple. It is not necessary that the Commons should take on themselves the business of administration, that they should request the Crown to make this man a bishop and that man a judge, to pardon one criminal and to execute another, to negotiate a treaty on a particular basis, or to send an expedition to a particular place. They have merely to declare that they have ceased to trust the ministry, and to ask for a ministry which they can trust.

Not the confidence of the King—

And that ministry has to retire, and the ministry they demand has to be formed, and no English king has ever refused it, though he has often complied with tears in his eyes.

What was the struggle. The English people meant to retain their rights and liberties. Macaulay says, in his review of Hallam's Constitutional History, that it was a standing army and the power of the Crown over the army and the right of the King to order them where he pleased, just as the late President of the United States ordered his Army from the frontier into Louisiana, South Carolina, and elsewhere in 1876; just as they may be ordered again, no matter where scattered, whenever his imperial majesty wishes, calling himself President, or calling himself king, or calling himself what you please, for when any President has the power of the Army in his hands he is imperial over the people. It was, Macaulay says, and we all know that it was, the power of the continental monarchs over a standing army that destroyed the liberties of the nations on the continent of Europe. It was because the people of England resisted the establishment of a standing army that their liberties were preserved. He says, in his review of Hallam's Constitutional History:

We will leave out of the question the whole history of his third Parliament, the price which he exacted for assenting to the Petition of Right, the perfidy with which he violated his engagements, the death of Eliot, the barbarous punishments inflicted by the star chamber, the ship-money, and all the measures, now universally condemned which disgraced his administration from 1630 to 1640.

Then he proceeds:

The constitution of England was only one of a large family. In all the monarchies of Western Europe, during the Middle Ages, there existed restraints on the royal authority, fundamental laws and representative assemblies. In the fifteenth century the government of Castile seems to have been as free as that of our own country. That of Arragon was beyond all question far more so. In France the sovereign was more absolute. Yet, even in France the states-general alone could constitutionally impose taxes; and at the very time when the authority of those assemblies was beginning to languish, the Parliament of Paris received such an accession of strength as enabled it, in some measure, to perform the functions of a legislative assembly. Sweden and Denmark had constitutions of a similar description.

Let us overleap two or three hundred years, and contemplate Europe at the commencement of the eighteenth century. Every free constitution, save one, had gone down. That of England had weathered the danger, and was riding in full security. In Denmark and Sweden the kings had availed themselves of the disputes which raged between the nobles and the commons to unite all the powers of government in their own hands. In France the institution of the states was only maintained by lawyers as a part of the ancient theory of their government. It slept a deep sleep—destined to be broken by a tremendous waking. No person remembered the sittings of the three orders, or expected ever to see them renewed. Louis the Fourteenth had imposed on his Parliament a patient silence of sixty years. His grandson, after the war of the Spanish succession, assimilated the constitution of Arragon to that of Castile, and extinguished the last feeble remains of liberty in the Peninsula. In England, on the other hand, the Parliament was infinitely more powerful than it had ever been. Not only was its legislative authority fully established, but its right to interfere, by advice almost equivalent to command, in every department of the executive government was recognized. The appointment of ministers, the relations with foreign powers, the conduct of a war, or a negotiation, depended less on the pleasure of the prince than on that of the two houses.

What, then, made us to differ? Why was it that in that epidemic malady of constitutions ours escaped the destroying influence; or rather that, at the very crisis of the disease, a favorable turn took place in England, and in England alone? It was not surely without a cause that so many kindred systems of government, having flourished together so long, languished and expired at almost the same time.

Macaulay tells why it was:

The progress of civilization introduced a great change. War became a science, and as a necessary consequence a separate trade. The great body of the people grew every day more reluctant to undergo the inconveniences of military service, and better able to pay others for undergoing them. A new class of men, therefore—dependent on the Crown alone; natural enemies of those popular rights which are to them as the dew to the fleece of Gideon; slaves among freemen; freemen among slaves—grew into importance. That physical force, which in the dark ages had belonged to the nobles and the commons, and had, far more than any charter or any assembly, been the safeguards of their privileges, was transferred entire to the king. Monarchy gained in two ways. The sovereign was strengthened, the subjects weakened. The great mass of the population, destitute of all military discipline and organism, ceased to exercise any influence by force on political transactions. There have, indeed, during the last hundred and fifty years been many popular insurrections in Europe, but all have failed except those in which the regular army has been induced to join the disaffected.

Again, in his review of Mackintosh's History, after telling that the Commons had become omnipotent and that the veto had never been exercised since 1693, and never would be again, he tells how it was that they managed to keep their power:

The authors of the revolution applied a remedy to this great abuse. They settled on the king not the fluctuating produce of certain fixed taxes, but a fixed sum sufficient for the support of his own royal state. They established it as a rule that all the expenses of the army, the navy, and the ordnance should be brought annually under the review of the House of Commons, and that every sum voted should be applied to the service specified in the vote. The direct effect of this change was important. The indirect effect has been more important still. From that time the House of Commons has been really the paramount power in the state. It has, in truth, appointed and removed ministers, declared war, and concluded peace. No combination of the King and the Lords has ever been able to effect anything against the Lower House backed by its constituents. Three or four times, indeed, the sovereign has been able to break the force of an opposition by dissolving the Parliament. But if that experiment should fail, if the people should be of the same mind with their representatives, he would clearly have no course left but to yield, to abdicate, or to fight.

It is always tiresome and uninteresting to read. I think I have read enough to show that the English House of Commons has uniformly demanded the redress of grievances before it felt called upon to grant supplies. Whether it bears upon this question or not as now presented to Congress it is not necessary to decide; but that the Commons often demanded the redress of grievances before granting supplies; that one king of England was beheaded, another dethroned, and the whole system of government revolutionized before they would give up one jot or tittle of that great power, is certain. In a very able article prepared at the request of the Legislature of Massachusetts, by the judges of their supreme court, of which Judge Gray, I believe, was the chief-justice, at least his name is signed first, they trace the history of many bills from beginning to end, and show that from the year 1678 whenever the House of Lords attempted to amend a tax bill the Commons indignantly denied their right to do so. Although the Lords had occasionally asserted their right to have something to say about it, they never had exercised it, and they close by a sentence, which I will read:

In that year, on a bill for an imposition on foreign commodities, the House of Commons unanimously resolved "That in all aids given to the King by the Commons the rate of tax ought not to be altered by the Lords," and asserted "that there is a fundamental right in that House alone, in bills of rates and impositions on merchandise, as to the matter, the measure, and the time." The Lords, on the other hand, resolved with equal unanimity that the power exercised by them in making amendments and abatements, "as to the matter, measure, and time, concerning the rates and impositions on merchandise, is the fundamental, inherent, and undoubted right of the House of Peers, from which they cannot depart." In 1678, on a supply bill being amended by the Lords, the House of Commons carried their doctrine still farther, and passed a resolution "That all aids and supplies, and aids to His Majesty in Parliament, are the sole gift of the Commons; and all bills for the granting of any such aids and supplies ought to begin with the Commons; and that it is the undoubted and sole right of the Commons to direct, limit, and appoint in such bills the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants, which ought not to be changed or altered by the House of Lords." On both those occasions the controversy between the two Houses was terminated by a prorogation of Parliament. But the resolution of 1678 has been often reaffirmed by the Commons, and made the foundation of their claim of privilege in matters of supply; and the Lords, though they have never expressly disclaimed the right to amend bills of supply, have never since practically asserted it when controverted by the Commons.

Mr. HOAR. Will not the Senator from Kentucky state to the Senate that that is the opinion of the judges of Massachusetts, that an appropriation bill is not a money bill? And is not that whole argument from beginning to end an historical argument to show that a money bill is merely a bill laying a tax, not a bill appropriating money, both in England and in this country, and that such bills as this can never be used for any such purpose?

Mr. BECK. Such bills as what?

Mr. HOAR. Such bills as the one now before the Senate must never be used in any such way. I ask the Senator if that argument is not that exactly?

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, this report was made at the request of the Legislature of Massachusetts, it is true under their constitutional authority to call upon the judges, to know what had been the practice in England and what ought to be the rule in Massachusetts with regard to originating appropriation bills in the house and senate, and whether an appropriation bill was in fact a money bill; and in the discussion of that question the judges looked into English history and what I read was a statement of a fact in English history—, not having anything to do with the immediate question as to whether it was an appropriation bill or a revenue bill, or as to the meaning of a money bill—the judges stated the historical fact that there had been no interference at any time by the Lords with the Commons on all questions relating to taxation, since 1678. And as the Senator from Massachusetts the other day undertook to show that nobody had ever withheld supplies, and no House of Commons had ever done it, I read from Macaulay's history and other authorities to prove that they had done it time and again. About the particular point that the Massachusetts judges were looking into I care nothing for the purpose of my argument, but what I am trying to show is this: that the men who framed the Federal Constitution were men well advised of what was going on in Europe, both in England and on the continent; they were men well read in history and law. Mr. Burke, in the great speech from which I read a few moments ago, said about them:

Permit me, sir, to add another circumstance in our colonies, which contributes no mean part towards the growth and effect of this intractable spirit—

As Lord North and others had called it.

I mean their education. In no country perhaps in the world is the law so general a study.

This was in 1773.

The profession itself is numerous and powerful, and in most provinces it takes the lead. The greater number of the deputies sent to the Congress were lawyers. But all who read, and most do read, endeavor to obtain some smattering in that science. I have been told by an eminent bookseller that in no branch of his business, after tracts of popular devotion, were so many books as those on the law exported to the plantations. The colonists have now fallen into the way of printing them for their own use. I hear that they have sold nearly as many of Blackstone's Commentaries in America as in England. General Gage marks out this disposition very particularly in a letter on your table. He states that all the people in his government are lawyers or smatterers in law, and that in Boston they have been enabled, by successful chicane, wholly to evade many parts of one of your capital penal constitutions.

The men of America were confessedly men read not only in the history of England, but in the laws as laid down by Blackstone, and one of the first things they saw when they looked over Blackstone was this. On page 170 of the edition by Tucker, Blackstone says:

For in a democracy there can be no exercise of sovereignty but by suffrage, which is the declaration of the people's will. In all democracies, therefore, it is of the utmost importance to regulate by whom and in what manner the suffrages are to be given. And the Athenians were so justly jealous of this prerogative that a stranger who interfered in the assemblies of the people was punished by their laws with death, because such a man was esteemed guilty of high treason by usurping those rights of sovereignty to which he had no title. In England, where the people do not debate in a collective body, but by representation, the exercise of this sovereignty consists in the choice of representatives. The laws have therefore very strictly guarded against usurpation and abuse of this power by many salutary provisions, which may be reduced to these three points: 1. The qualifications of the electors. 2. The qualifications of the elected. 3. The proceedings at elections.

And on page 179, after showing that by the laws of Great Britain persons convicted of bribery at elections are punished severely, he says:

As soon, therefore, as the time and place of election, either in counties or boroughs, are fixed, all soldiers quartered in the place are to remove, at least one day before the election, to the distance of two miles or more, and not to return till one day after the poll is ended. Riots, likewise, have been frequently determined to make an election void.

So careful were the people of England, as the men of America well knew, that even in Blackstone's time there were heavy penalties against soldiers approaching the polls; in the early reign of George II a statute was enacted, which was re-enacted in the eleventh year of Victoria, with a shorter preamble it is true, but still quite full, from which I prefer to read to reading the old statute of George II:

SEC. 2. And be it enacted, That on every day appointed for the nomination or for the election or for taking the poll for the election of a member or members to serve in the Commons House of Parliament no soldier within two miles of any city, borough, town, or place where such nomination or election shall be declared or poll taken shall be allowed to go out of the barrack or quarters in which he is stationed, unless for the purpose of mounting or relieving guard, or for giving his vote at such election; and that every soldier allowed to go out for any such purpose within the limits aforesaid shall return to his barrack or quarters with all convenient speed as soon as his guard shall have been relieved or vote tendered.

SEC. 3. And be it enacted, That when and so often as any election of any member or members to serve in the Commons House of Parliament shall be appointed to be made, the clerk of the Crown in chancery or other officer making out any new writ for such elections shall, with all convenient speed, after making out the same writ, give notice thereof to the secretary at war, or, in case there shall be no secretary at war, to the person officiating in his stead, who shall, at some convenient time before the day appointed for such election, give notice thereof in writing to the general officer commanding in each district of Great Britain, who shall thereupon give the necessary orders for enforcing the execution of this act in all places under his command.

Many of the States of the American Union re-enacted substantially the same provision.

Section 33 of an act to regulate elections, passed in 1846 by the State of New Jersey, provided that—

No such election shall be appointed to be held on any day on which the militia of this State shall be required to do military duty, nor shall the militia of this State be required to do military duty on any day on which any such election shall be appointed to be held.—Nixon's Digest, Laws of New Jersey, 1709-1855, page 220.

OF THE MANNER OF CONDUCTING ELECTIONS AND RETURNING VOTES.

SEC. 1. No meeting for the election of national, State, district, county, city, or town officers shall be held on a day upon which the militia of the Commonwealth are by law required to do military duty.—General Statutes of Massachusetts, 1860, chapter 7, page 58.

PENAL PROVISIONS AND REGULATIONS AFFECTING PURITY OF ELECTIONS.

SEC. 62. If any officer of the militia parades his men, or exercises any military command on a day of election of a public officer, as described in section 63 of chapter 10, and not thereby excepted, or except in time of war or public danger, he shall for each offense forfeit not less than ten nor more than three hundred dollars.—Revised Statutes of Maine, 1857, chapter 4, page 84.

PENALTIES FOR THE VIOLATION OF ELECTION LAWS.

SEC. 5. If any officer or other person shall call out or order any of the militia of this State to appear and exercise on any day during any election to be held by virtue of this chapter, or within five days previous thereto, except in cases of invasion or insurrection, he shall forfeit the sum of $500 for every such offense.—Revised Statutes of New York, Banks & Brothers, fifth edition, volume 1, title 7, chapter 6, page 448.

I.—OF ELECTIONS BY THE CITIZENS.

110. No body of troops in the Army of the United States or of this Commonwealth shall be present, either armed or unarmed, at any place of election within this Commonwealth, during the time of such election: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent any officer or soldier from exercising the right of suffrage in the election district to which he may belong if otherwise qualified according to law.—Purdon's Digest; Brightly, 1700-1861, Laws of Pennsylvania, page 383.

So that the practice of allowing soldiers to be stationed at the polls is not only condemned in England, condemned by the several States of America, condemned by the practice of the Federal Government, but condemned by the constitutional limitations that are imposed upon the Federal Government, because unless the governor or the Legislature ask for troops the President of the United States has no power to send them either to keep the peace at the polls or for any other purpose.

I said the men of America were fully advised of all these things when they framed the Constitution. The statement of Mr. Burke proves it. We know it from what they did, even if it had not been so stated by Mr. Burke or anybody else. They knew the history of Europe; they knew that liberty had been overthrown by standing armies all over the continent. They were so jealous of them that after the Constitution was framed, notwithstanding that great covenant seemed to give every guarantee that the citizen could demand, they required the first Congress which met to adopt ten amendments all of them bearing upon the personal liberty of the citizen and several of them emphatically declaring against the use of the military power in any form to interfere with their personal rights and liberties; they insisted on maintaining their own militia and their personal right to bear arms, and that no soldier should be quartered on them in time of peace, nor in war, except upon terms previously prescribed by law, and they reserved all power not expressly granted.

The men who framed the American Constitution had studied Magna Charta, the Petition of Rights, the Bill of Rights, the habeas corpus act, and all the great acts of English liberty. They knew them well; they were household words to them. They went into revolution and maintained their rights and privileges against England when she saw fit to invade them, and they maintained against fearful odds a war waged for seven years to assert them. They crystallized these great principles in the Constitution; they enforced them by every form of expression that could strengthen or add to their vigor, force, and efficiency. Yet gentlemen stand here now at this period of the world's history, with all these facts before them, with the knowledge that their forefathers were struggling to guard the liberties of this people even more strictly than the English people had guarded their liberties, with the knowledge of what England had done, with the fate of the nations on the continent growing out of the use of standing armies, and they tell the people of America and the democratic party of this country that when we insist, in the exercise of our undoubted right, that soldiers shall not in time of peace be stationed at the polls under Federal military orders, we are revolutionists; that we are seeking to overthrow the Government; that we are seeking to starve every branch of it because they for some bad purpose desire that soldiers shall be kept at the polls to coerce the votes of citizens.

Gentlemen on the other side tell us they are going to the country upon that issue; that they are going to appeal to the northern people, and insist that the southern generals and their allies are seeking to keep the soldiers away from the polls to prevent the peace from being kept. We will appeal to the country too, and we will tell the people of the whole country, North and South, as all will know who read the history of the world and the history of their own times, that their own State governments can keep the peace, their own militia, their own marshals, their own sheriffs, their own posse comitatus, without Federal intervention and without marshals, deputy marshals, supervisors, or anybody else, no matter how immaculate they may be, from John Davenport up or down, selected, paid, and ordered from Washington. The story of radical corruption in the administration at Washington has been too often told and too well proved by republicans themselves to give the people anywhere much faith in the superior purity and virtue of Washington agents over their own.

The amazing thing to me is that gentlemen on the other side should venture to taunt anybody with being revolutionary or with attempting to do anything by coercion after all that they have done, after all the laws that they have passed, and all the coercion that they have imposed upon States, Presidents, and courts. But before speaking as to that I desire to say that even the committee of which Mr. Howard was chairman in 1863, when it made a report against the bill introduced by Governor Powell, of Kentucky, although they were opposing any restriction being put upon the military, when their attention was called to the English bills and the bills of the several States, notwithstanding their opposition, they had to admit that the use of soldiers at the polls was not in accordance with the ancient rules, usages, or liberties of the people, either of England or America. They said:

It is said, by way of furnishing a precedent for the bill—

That is, the Powell bill—that by the laws of England in force for more than a century, no body of the King's troops is allowed to be near the place of an election while it is progressing. Reference is doubtless had to the act of 8 George II, 1735, a copy of which we append to this report, marked A. It cannot escape notice that the leading object of this ancient statute, as sufficiently evidenced by the preamble, was "the preservation of the rights and liberties of the kingdom," not their destruction. And the history of the time shows that the prohibition to keep military forces near places where there was an election of members of Parliament, arose from outrages practiced upon the electors by the ministers in posting troops so as to overawe them and coerce them into the returning of candidates friendly to the ministerial party, and the supporters of prerogative against popular rights. And we are told that, so far did this party push their schemes, that in 1734, the year before the act was passed, the ministers, before the election took place, made out a list of the sixteen Scottish peers who were to be elected, which was approved by the Crown; and that, among other foul means resorted to for securing their election, a battalion of the King's troops were drawn up in the court of Edinburgh, contrary to custom, and without any apparent cause but that of overawing the electors. This outrage appears to have been the immediate occasion of the passage of the act. It was passed in the interest of liberty, and in resistance of the tyrannical schemes of the Crown and its flatterers to check its growth by stifling the voice of free election.

That is precisely what we are proposing to provide, that no President shall send his troops into any State of this Union and parade them at the polls to aid anybody. At the very time when the Powell bill was under consideration it was inquired of me yesterday whether Kentucky was not in a state of war and trouble. No, sir; on the contrary the very thing was being done there which these gentlemen in this report denounce as having been done in England. Governor Bramlette was sustained as the Administration candidate. Polls were opened for him, and everybody who was willing to vote for him was allowed to vote. Polls were opened in each of the congressional districts of the State, and men who were partisans of the Administration and were supposed to be willing to carry out their views were voted for at the very places where the polls were closed against Governor Wickliffe. Mr. Trimble, who afterward held a seat in Congress and who had been an undoubted Union man and was severely punished by some of his own people because he was a Union man, was lodged in jail because he dared to run against the pet of the Administration for Congress at that election.

These things induced Senator Powell to endeavor to have a law passed preventing soldiers from driving men away from the polls at the voting precincts all over Kentucky, all over Missouri, all over Maryland. When the provision which we are now seeking to repeal was inserted by Mr. Pomeroy, it was simply moved by him, as he said, because war was still flagrant, and because for a time, while war was flagrant, something might happen that might make it well for military men to be at the polls to keep the peace, as he called it. That being so much better than the previous condition of things, it was assented to in order to obtain some relief. Now it is called revolutionary to ask to strike it out. The people of this country are all revolutionists if this is revolutionary.

I propose to make a suggestion or two about what might well be called revolutionary acts perpetrated by gentlemen on the other side, as they are hurling their anathemas against us. In 1868 an act was passed by the republican House and voted for by some of the distinguished Senators who are now crying "revolution!" which I propose to read, and which I think exceeds anything in the way of revolutionary proceedings that I have ever known. The Supreme Court of the United States in 1868 consisted of eight members; five was a quorum by law; and this provision was passed by the House by a party vote:

That if any circuit or district court of the United States shall adjudge any act of Congress to be unconstitutional or invalid, the judgment, before any further proceedings shall be had upon it, shall be certified up to the Supreme Court of the United States and shall be considered therein; and if, upon the consideration thereof, two-thirds of all the members of the Supreme Court shall not affirm said judgment below, the same shall be declared and held reversed.

That is, that although the circuit court of the United States might declare an act of Congress unconstitutional, null, and void, and although the five judges of the Supreme Court, who constitute a quorum by law, might all sit upon the case and each seriatim write out an opinion that it was unconstitutional, null, and void, still unless six judges, more than the quorum necessary, two-thirds of all, should agree that that act was unconstitutional the judgment of the court below should be reversed and the act of Congress should stand. What is the meaning of that? That the Supreme Court should not revise, should not look into nor act upon any of the legislation which that Congress saw fit to impose upon the country. The distinguished Senator from Maine was there voting for it, the distinguished Senator from Illinois was there voting for it, and many others voted to overthrow and ignore the Supreme Court by annulling its decisions who are now crying us down as revolutionists. Although, as I said, the circuit judge might declare it unconstitutional and every judge of the Supreme Court who sat upon the case, and by law constituted a court, might declare it unconstitutional, still unless six of the eight agreed that it was unconstitutional, it had to stand and remain in full force and effect. If we had been attempting legislation like that they might have told us with propriety that we meant revolution and were destroying and subverting the rights of the people and setting at naught their Constitution, and they could doubtless have argued it well, judging from their ability to argue a bad cause. But when we are simply seeking to keep soldiers away from the polls, suggestions of revolution seem to me to come with bad grace from men who voted for the proposition I have read.

On the question of good faith, I am speaking of it only as a question of good faith, as it is an accomplished fact. In 1865, when the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution was submitted to the States by Congress, proposing to abolish slavery all over the country, it was adopted, among other State Legislatures, by the Legislatures of the States of Tennessee, Arkansas, South Carolina, Alabama, North Carolina, and Georgia, in all twenty-seven, and proclaimed by Mr. Seward, then Secretary of State, as an amendment duly adopted, because it had been voted for by the Legislatures of all those States. On the 5th of December, 1865, Mr. Seward wrote to the acting governor of Alabama the following note:

The President congratulates you and the country upon the acceptance of the congressional amendment of the Constitution of the United States by the State of Alabama, which vote, being the twenth-seventh, fills up the complement of two-thirds, and gives the amendment finishing effect as a part of the organic law of the land.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

WASHINGTON, December 5, 1865.

All the twenty-seven States named had organized State Legislatures sufficient for the purpose of declaring the thirteenth amendment adopted, taking away and liberating all the slaves of Kentucky, Maryland, and Missouri against their will and against their vote. Were these Southern States then States or not? If they were not States and had no State Legislatures, could they vote to ratify an amendment to the Constitution which deprived other States of their rights against the votes of the protesting States, such as Kentucky, Missouri, and Maryland? I suppose not, and yet in less than two years after that time those very States that thus had so voted, had so ratified the thirteenth constitutional amendment by their Legislatures, although they had committed no act of war, treason, or rebellion after that, although the war was over and peace had been proclaimed, were told by the votes of gentlemen now charging revolution on us that they were not States, and had not been since the war. All the machinery of their State governments was destroyed; they were put under the ban of military authority and deprived of representation, though heavily taxed; their citizens were disfranchised, by order of Congress, by the thousand, many of them the men who had voted to adopt the thirteenth amendment. Although the Senator from Maine said only fourteen thousand in all were disfranchised, when he comes to look at the section of the law of July, 1867, in its wide, sweeping operation as construed, he will find that one hundred thousand will not cover the disfranchisement of the most intelligent and wealthy of that people; yet these gentlemen talk to us about revolution after such acts as these.

I might cite instance after instance of acts of that kind by the republican party, wrongs perpetrated in a thousand ways, but I will not take the time; it would consume too much time. I have spoken too long already. I will barely allude to one other question and close. Have we any precedents for the course we are pursuing? Gentlemen on the other side say no. I assert we have abundant precedents, and some very remarkable ones. I do not care to go over them all, and do not propose to do so. I will call attention to a few of them, however.

In 1849 an effort was made to admit California as a State. In February of that year, not being able to pass that proposition as an independent measure, when a bill was up making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic service of the Government, Mr. Walker, of Wisconsin, offered an amendment to that bill providing that all the territory acquired from Mexico should be organized into revenue collection districts, with officers to take care of the revenue and protect the property of the Government and do many other things. In other words, he sought to establish substantially a territorial government. Mr. John Bell, of Tennessee, moved to amend that amendment by admitting California into the Union as a State as an amendment to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill. The amendment is now lying before me, providing for all the machinery of courts and government and Legislatures and elections. When he moved that amendment Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, rose and inquired whether that was germane. The Vice-President, Mr. Dallas, said:

In the opinion of the Chair, the amendment is in order. If there is any doubt upon the point, the Chair would very much prefer that there should be an appeal.

Mr. Webster was then in this body, and he said:

I have no doubt that the Chair is right in his decision.

An appeal was taken and the appeal was laid upon the table by a vote of 22 to 14, thereby declaring that it was in order to admit the State of California by an amendment to an appropriation bill, Mr. Webster advocating it, the Vice-President deciding it, and the Senate by a vote of 22 to 14 sustaining it. It was not admitted on final hearing before the Senate. The territorial form in substance of Mr. Walker was agreed to; but it was regarded as a legitimate amendment.

In the debate upon that amendment these remarkable facts were developed: one was, that two years before, when the Army appropriation bill was before Congress during the Mexican war and President Polk required $3,000,000 to carry on the war, the Congress of the United States attached a proviso to the Army bill applying the Wilmot proviso, as it was called, to all the territories that were acquired from Mexico, and that proviso became a law in the Army appropriation bill; the $3,000,000 necessary to carry on existing war was withheld until the President was coerced into the signing of the bill with that provision in it, if you see fit to use that expression. That certainly looked like coercion, when the battles of the country could not be fought nor its armies in a foreign country fed, when the money could not be obtained even to carry on the Mexican war, unless these gentlemen, most of whom I suppose are now upon the other side, could have the somewhat notorious Wilmot proviso, excluding slavery from all territory acquired, applied to and made a part of the bill.

In 1856 a provision which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said in part he objected to, but the first provision of which he thought was all right, was added to the Army appropriation bill and voted in by a republican House of Representatives by a vote of 91 to 86, which I will read:

Provided, nevertheless, That no part of the military force of the United States herein provided for shall be employed in aid of the enforcement of the enactments of the alleged Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Kansas, recently assembled at Shawnee Mission, until Congress shall have enacted either that it was or was not a valid Legislative Assembly, chosen in conformity with the organic law by the people of the said Territory: And provided, That until Congress shall have passed on the validity of the said Legislative Assembly of Kansas it shall be the duty of the President to use the military force in said Territory to preserve the peace, suppress insurrection, repel invasion, and protect persons and property therein and upon the national highways in the State of Missouri or elsewhere from unlawful seizures and searches: And be it further provided, That the President is required to disarm the present organized militia of the Territory of Kansas, and recall all the United States arms therein distributed, and to prevent armed men from going into said Territory to disturb the public peace or aid in the enforcement or resistance of real or pretended laws.

The first clause of that amendment meets the approbation of the Senator from Massachusetts, which means that Congress shall have power to declare territorial laws null and void, not by repealing them, as Congress had the right to do in the Territories or in the District of Columbia, but by declaring that they are of no force and effect although they are laws on the statute-book passed under authority of Congress and with all the forms and binding effect of existing law; in other words, he claims, and the House claimed, that the law-making power could annul the laws, could deprive men of rights under laws it has passed—a proposition which is denied by all commentators on constitutional law. Judge Story, Chancellor Kent, and indeed all agree that there is no power in the Congress of the United States to declare or decide upon the meaning of laws or to do anything else except repeal them when it has the power so to do; so long as they remain unrepealed, it is the duty of the President to see that the laws as passed are faithfully executed; and they can only be annulled by the action of the courts; the judiciary was established for the very purpose of declaring whether they were valid or invalid, and it was never the province of Congress to do so. Yet that portion of the amendment I have read meets the approval of the Senator from Massachusetts, while the repeal of an unconstitutional proviso, as proposed by us in the bill now before the Senate, is denounced by him as revolutionary.

Added to all that, by the amendment then adopted by the republican majority the arms of private citizens were to be taken away from them, arms that had been given to the militia, arms that belonged to them, arms that the United States had no more right to take away than it has to come to my house and take away the arms that belong to me; the Constitution says citizens shall not be forbidden to carry arms, because a well-organized militia is necessary to free government; the Federal troops were to invade the State of Missouri and guard the public highways; all these things were maintained by the republican party in an amendment to an Army appropriation bill and carried through the House successfully. That was revolutionary, perhaps. Certainly if that amendment or any provision in it could meet the sanction of the Senator from Massachusetts, there is nothing in the provision we now offer that ought not to receive his cordial and hearty support, which I neither hope for nor desire.

The list of similar cases might be multiplied, but I believe I will not attempt to read any more. I have a memorandum of some of the most important of them in my hand. There is one which perhaps might as well be referred to now. It is a short and plain one. The State of Iowa has nine Representatives sitting in the lower House to-day. What title have they? The Congress of the United States, by the twenty-fifth section of the Revised Statutes, passed a general law providing that elections of members of Congress should be uniform throughout the United States, and should be held on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November in each alternate year. The State of Iowa held her election in October, 1878, in violation of that law, because on the sundry civil appropriation bill, approved March 3, 1875, a provision was inserted:

SEC. 6. That section 25 of the Revised Statutes, prescribing the time for holding elections for Representatives to Congress, is hereby modified so as not to apply to any State that has not yet changed its day of election, and whose constitution must be amended in order to effect a change in the day of the election of State officers in said State.

It is by virtue of that clause appended to the sundry civil appropriation bill that the State of Iowa is entitled to representation and is represented in the lower House of Congress to-day, and only by reason of that proviso so added to that appropriation bill.

I made a minute of some other cases which the republican party have passed upon. I will cite only a few of them.

By section 3 of the sundry civil bill approved in 1864, (thirteenth volume Statutes at Large, page 351,) in a provision in no way connected with the subject, all the laws relating to testimony in the Federal courts were overthrown and negroes and parties in interest were allowed to testify by a proviso attached to an appropriation bill. In 1868 (15 Statutes at Large, page 119) the whole machinery and organization of the Patent Office was overthrown and remodeled in an appropriation bill. A year or two afterward all the machinery of the Treasury Department was remodeled in an appropriation bill. By looking at 16 Statutes at Large, page 40, it will be found that by a proviso in an appropriation bill all the Indian treaties that had been entered into since 1867 were suspended and two millions of dollars were placed in the hands of the President of the United States in bulk to keep the peace among the Indians; and by the same bill the peace commission, so called, was organized.

It has been stated so often that it need hardly be repeated, (it will be found in the seventeenth volume, page 348,) that the supervisors and marshals law was amended, modified, and extended—one of the provisions now sought to be repealed by a bill pending in the other House—on the 10th day of June, 1872, by a republican Congress in an appropriation bill. The celebrated Drake amendment, which annulled the decisions of the Supreme Court and set aside the pardons that had been granted by the President, including those granted by Mr. Lincoln, was also attached to and made part of an appropriation bill. So that there can be no possible propriety in gentlemen on the other side questioning us as to our action on this bill, or doubting that the President will approve the legislation now proposed, because it is attached to an appropriation bill, especially a bill to which it is certainly germane under the most rigid rules as Congress has the power, "to raise and support armies," and "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." We are by this bill regulating the use of the money appropriated from the Treasury for the support of the Army.

That is all I care to say upon the subject of congressional precedents, because the precedents are so numerous, they are so well established and so thoroughly understood that no gentleman on the other side will venture to assert that there is anything unusual or uncommon in the provision now proposed to the pending bill. The other provisions are not before us. I do not propose to discuss them at this time. There are provisions as to which I have spoken casually which I have no doubt will be laid before the Senate, looking to giving litigants in courts honest juries, looking to the freeing of the polls at elections from the presence of such men as we know are now paid out of the public Treasury to remain there for the worst of purposes. I may endeavor to discuss these propositions when the time comes, if discussion upon them is to be had. In the mean time I will only repeat that the history of the republican party shows that it is the duty of democrats, whenever they have the power, it is a duty the people demand the performance of, and the representatives of the people everywhere owe it to them, that wherever they can curtail the military power of this Government and hold it so that it shall not be a standing menace to liberty, right, or law, either at the polls or in the organization of their Legislatures, they ought to do it.

Sir, I have seen, we all have seen in the last ten years the State of Georgia, after she had representatives on the floor of Congress, her representative men sitting in these Halls voting for or against laws to bind the people of the United States, invaded by a Federal Army by orders from Washington, and nineteen duly elected democrats turned out of her legislative halls and others put in their place. We have seen a railway employé set up by Federal bayonets as speaker of her house of representatives, and the great State of Georgia crushed to the earth by military authority of the United States. We have seen the State of Louisiana seized, her Legislature dispersed, her State-house held by Federal soldiers under pretended judgments of United States courts, and United States marshals ordered by the President, or their action at least indorsed by all of the authorities at Washington over and over again in taking control of the Army of the United States and using it for the basest of purposes until a committee of this House, four of them uniting in the report and the others only refusing to unite because the views of the four constituting the majority were not strong enough, denouncing the military interference in the strongest and boldest terms; they were, the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] the then Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. Alcorn,) and the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] all declaring that there was no pretense of authority for Judge Durell or those acting under him, or for Marshal Packard or the authority that he called in to intervene, which was the United States Army that was brought from Florida and elsewhere to take possession of the State-house of Louisiana. Judge Trumbull, of Illinois, Mr. Morton, of Indiana, the other two members, laid before the Senate their own views in which they were equally emphatic and perhaps more so. Judge Trumbull used this language—Attorney-General George H. Williams had telegraphed Marshal Packard, under whom the military were placed on the same level as the common spies, informers, and detectives:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 3, 1872.

S. B. PACKARD, Esq.,
United States Marshal, New Orleans, Louisiana:

You are to enforce the decrees and mandates of the United States courts, no matter by whom resisted, and General Emory will furnish you with all necessary troops for that purpose.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois, in his report states how this was done:

This dispatch, so far as the evidence shows, was not responsive to any call for troops; there had been no resistance to any process of the United States courts, nor does it appear that any was threatened. R. H. Jackson, a captain in the First Artillery, United States Army, testified that he went to New Orleans on the night of December 5 with two batteries of his regiment and eighty-six men.

The same night, December 5, between nine and eleven o'clock, Judge Durell, at his private lodgings, issued his order, which, for want of jurisdiction, was void, and entitled to no respect from anybody, directing the United States marshal forthwith to take possession of the State-house, to hold the same until the further order of the court, and prevent all unlawful assemblage of persons therein, having reference to the persons returned as elected to the Legislature according to the official returns. Captain Jackson testifies that he took possession of the State-house at about two o'clock on the morning of the 6th, with instructions to take and hold it under the direction of the United States marshal and to act in obedience to his orders. He further testified that he was not stationed in the State-house to prevent riots, but to hold the building, and that if a riot had occurred in front of the building he would not have interfered. He posted two soldiers at the entrance door, who guarded it with crossed bayonets, and suffered no one to enter the building except by permission of the United States marshal, one of whose deputies was at all times present. These troops continued to occupy the State-house for more than six weeks, until January 21, and it is manifest, from the whole testimony, that they were not there to preserve the peace, but to carry out the illegal orders of Judge Durell, and prevent the legally elected members of the Legislature from assembling and organizing.

It is because we are seeking now to render such occurrences impossible under pretenses of that sort, or other equally frivolous excuses or unconstitutional or illegal claims of having the Army of the United States used for any such purpose, that we are called revolutionists. Sir, I have as high respect for the Army of the United States and the men who compose it as any gentleman on this floor; but rather than see them take possession of the polls, rather than see them interfere with the rights of citizens or invade Legislatures or carry out military orders such as have been given and will be given again if the power is continued and the present law is allowed to stand, I would disband the Army; I would arm the frontiersmen, no matter what it cost, to protect themselves and their families against the hostile Indians; I would organize the militia of each of the States, which Mr. Jefferson in his inaugural said was the best safeguard in time of peace and for the first moments of war, so as to protect all men in their rights at the polls and elsewhere within all the States. By the way, I made a note from Mr. Jefferson's inaugural address that perhaps it might be well for the Senate to hear once more. He said:

A well-regulated militia is our best reliance in time of peace and for the first moments of war till regulars can relieve them.

And among the fundamental principles which he laid down as indispensable to the existence of free government were—

The support of the State governments in all their rights as the most competent administratives of our domestic concerns and the surest bulwarks against antirepublican tendencies, * * * a jealous care of the right of election by the people, * * * and trial by juries impartially selected. * * * The wisdom of our sages and the blood of our heroes have been devoted to their attainment; they should be the creed of our political faith, the text of civic instruction; the touchstone by which to try the services of those we trust, and should we wander from them in moments of error or of alarm, let us hasten to retrace our steps and to regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty, and safety.

I can add nothing to that except to say, these are my sentiments.

Mr. President, as I understand it, we are only seeking to regain the road which in moments of error and alarm we have so strangely departed from. If there is any other purpose on the part of any democrat, I am not aware of it. I will go as far as he who goes farthest to protect the liberty of this people and the rights of the Federal Government in every form, but I will also maintain the rights of the States and the rights of the citizens of the States to cast their ballots free from Federal interference, without the bayonet interposing, in the exercise of their highest constitutional privilege. I will leave nothing undone that will help contribute to that end.

I thank Senators for their attention.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Before my colleague proceeds will he yield to me for a moment to make a correction?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire my colleague to yield to me for a moment to make a correction and to put a question.

The Senator from Kentucky yesterday stated as his reason for addressing the Senate that he desired to reply to a charge which had been made against him, as he termed it, by myself. He has touched upon many topics; he has avoided with great care touching upon the charge, if he chooses to give it that appellation, the criticism which I made upon his previous utterances in the Senate. I desired to correct his understanding and to call his attention to the true point during his speech, but he was unwilling to be interrupted for that purpose.

The Senator from Kentucky has said that he was charged with being revolutionary because of a purpose to repeal or revise an existing section of the Revised Statutes in regard to the use of the Army. No man has characterized that purpose as revolutionary. He has said that he has been charged, and some persons who think with him have been charged, with being revolutionary because of a purpose to put general legislation upon an appropriation bill. No person has charged him or anybody else with being revolutionary for that reason, or has condemned that practice. It has been done a thousand times. The thing which the Senator from Kentucky has not discussed is this: suppose the President of the United States differs with him in thinking that heavy penalties ought to be extended to persons who take troops to the polls to keep the peace, and in enacting legislation on that subject, and conceiving himself bound by the Constitution of the United States, if he does not approve a bill for that purpose, to return it with his objections, the purpose which I characterized as revolutionary is a purpose to bring this Government to an end unless the President yields that constitutional opinion. The Senator from Kentucky said in the passage which was quoted by me, and from which I will read a single sentence again: "Unless those rights were secured to the people"—that is, the rights, as he calls them, provided for in this legislation—"they would refuse under their constitutional right to make appropriations to carry on the Government," and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] who immediately followed him, said:

We claim the right to say that we will not grant the money of the people unless there is a redress of grievances.

Nobody has declared, so far as I know, whether the President will or will not agree with the House or agree with the Senate in regard to this proposed legislation. The Senator from Kentucky declared that if the President did not agree with the House, and, not agreeing with the House, did not sign a bill which he disapproved, the House, with his approbation, would refuse to make the appropriations necessary to carry on the Government. Now, the question I wish to put to him is: does he stand by that purpose, or does he abandon it? Do you stand by that declaration, or do you back out? That question in his four-hour speech he has most carefully and skillfully and advisedly refused to touch upon or refused to permit any person to call his attention to.

Now, one other thing before I sit down. The Senator from Kentucky represented me as saying that the English House of Commons never withheld supplies from the Crown. I said no such thing. I said the contrary. I adverted to repeated instances of the contrary. What I said was that they never withheld supplies from the Crown which were necessary for carrying on the government, that they never shut up a court, that they never refused to provide for the troops necessary for the defense of the realm. I do not speak of foreign wars, but for the defense of the realm; that in the first year of every king's reign down to William III, the taxes were granted to the king for life, and that the hereditary revenues of the Crown supported every necessary function of sovereignty, of government, of civil order, and of the protection of the realm. Now does the Senator from Kentucky deny that proposition, or does he agree to it?

Mr. BECK. Has the Senator from Massachusetts the speech I made before him? I have not.

Mr. HOAR. I have the extract which I read from.

Mr. BECK. I should like to hear it. I have sent for it.

Mr. HOAR. What I want to know while the Senator is finding his speech, I will repeat. Does the Senator from Kentucky now say for himself and the political friends with whom he has been in conference, that if the President of the United States differs with him about the effect and necessity of this clause, he will refuse to grant the supplies necessary to carry on this Government?

Mr. BECK. I have sent for the speech I made; I hope it will be here in a moment, so that I may read the exact words I used. I have no more right to assume that the President will refuse to sign this bill than the Senator from Massachusetts has. I have no knowledge or information upon the subject. I have said in every speech I have made that I believed the President would sign it, as he ought to do. I did say in the speech referred to, during the last Congress, that if the bills were sent to him, as I then believed they would be, separately, and he signed them as he ought to do, we would then pass all the appropriation bills, as he asked us to do, and be ready to go home; that if he refused to sign those bills separately they would be attached to the appropriation bills, and if he saw fit to veto them the consequence would be upon him. But I will read exactly what I said:

As to the revolutionary measures that it is said may be attempted if an extra session is had, I have said what I believe will be done. I only speak for myself. I know nothing positively as to what the democratic Congress will do. But after they have fairly tendered to the President, as they have the undoubted right to do, acts repealing the sections that authorize soldiers to go to the polls to keep the peace and that authorize deputy marshals to order them to go there under any pretense, and acts repealing all the test oaths in reference to jurors, so that men can have honest juries before whom to try their cases, and acts repealing the authority given to the marshals and supervisors at the polls to control the elections, if the President, in the exercise of his constitutional authority, shall see fit to veto measures so just and so fair, so necessary to free government as those laws are, then I for one would again make them part of the appropriation bills and let him exercise his veto power if he determines to perpetuate these wrongs on the bills that appropriate the money necessary to maintain the Government, and let him be responsible by his veto for stopping the wheels of the Government, as he would be if he determines that such measures as these are sufficiently important to keep on the statute-book for partisan purposes to block the wheels of Government. Then the Executive and his aiders and abettors would be responsible to the country, and not the Congress that gave him the opportunity to attach his signature to necessary appropriation bills. I will not occupy the time of the Senate any longer.

That is what I said.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. The gentleman will allow me to proceed.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator said he would not occupy the time of the Senate any longer.

Mr. BECK. The Senator's question to me a little while ago was almost impertinent, and I came very near telling the Senator so; and now he will sit down until I am through. I never threatened the President. I said what I have read. I believed I spoke the sentiments of the people of this country when I said that we would tender him bills just, fair, and honest. I assumed that he would sign them, and I assume so now. If he refuse to sign them, then the responsibility, in my judgment, looking at the bills as I do, will be upon his head and upon the partisans who seek to make him take that course. I will state what I will do then. If the President refuses to sign them—and that is the question put to me—I will consult with the wisest and best men of my party and with good men everywhere to see, when that lamentable condition of things comes, what is my duty as an American Senator under all the circumstances, and I will do it in the best interests of the American people. [Applause in the galleries.] I will not stop the wheels of Government——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The Senator from Kentucky will suspend a moment. There must be no disorder in the galleries. The Chair will order the galleries to be cleared at once if the applause is repeated.

Mr. BECK. I hope that the contingency suggested will never arise. It never ought to arise, in my judgment, but if it does I hope there is patriotism enough, intelligence enough, integrity enough in the dominant party in the two Houses of Congress to devise the ways and means to get out of the trouble with honor to us all. That is the only statement I have made. I have never made a threat. I never looked beyond to that contingency. I have said that the responsibility would be upon the President and upon the partisans who, in defiance of all their past conduct, in defiance of the precedents of this body, are seeking to urge upon the President to step out of his way when there is no effort made to infringe his constitutional prerogatives, or the prerogatives of the judiciary or of any other department of this Government, or to interfere with any constitutional right of any citizen, or to press upon him hasty or ill-considered legislation, or to do anything which comes within the legitimate scope of his veto power according to the construction put upon it by the men who framed the Constitution or by anybody since, try to induce him to do what no President ever has done before, to veto the repeal of laws. And why? Simply because there are partisans in this body and in the other House who, having lost power and being now in the minority and unable to carry out their own will and to keep dead laws on the statute-books themselves, hope, though still in the minority and not representing the majority of this people, to call in the President to their aid, because they say he is their party friend, to save them and their laws against the will of the people as represented by the majority.

I am not going to submit to be asked questions in any such style on this floor. I have stated my views. I have read what I consider the true history of England in regard to those things. I have stated my opinion about them. I do not profess to speak for the democratic party. The President has had no threat from this great party. The first thing he will receive will be this bill, if we pass it, with this simple provision in it. That is all he will know as President. He will see that as the first thing when it is laid before him, for all the talk of myself and the Senator from Massachusetts and of gentlemen of either House as to their individual opinions amounts only to idle wind so far as he is concerned. His constitutional duty is to consider this bill presented to him fairly, each clause of it, and if there is nothing in it that runs counter to the ancient precedents of the country, nothing that is dangerous to the liberties of the people, nothing that overthrows the Constitution of the United States, nothing that infringes upon his high prerogative as the Chief Executive of this country, or upon the prerogative of the judiciary as a co-ordinate branch of it, then, believing it to be his duty to sign it, and believing that he cannot be driven away from his duty, I have always said that I believed he would sign it. If unfortunately he shall do otherwise, then, as I said, I will when that calamity arises and that contingency comes consult carefully what it is best to do, and I will do it, I hope, wisely and well.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, when I rose just now the Senator from Kentucky had said that he should detain the Senate no longer.

Mr. EATON. That was what he read.

Mr. HOAR. I thought it was his own remark; and that was what induced me to rise before he had yielded the floor. I thought he had got through. The Senator from Kentucky avoids—I will not say evades—reading the substantial and important sentence of the speech which has been commented upon. Now he says that if the President vetoes a bill he will consult with the wise men, not from the east but from the South, or from wherever they come.

Mr. BECK. I will not consult the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. What he said before was: "Unless those rights were secured * * * they would refuse, under their constitutional right, to make appropriations to carry on the Government." The Senator from Kentucky was by no means uttering an individual opinion. He had been appointed by this body to confer (as the representative, with his two associates, of the entire Senate) with the House of Representatives, the co-ordinate legislative department of this Government, and he was reporting to us the purpose of the House as learned by him from the conferees on the part of that body, and he so declared, and he said that these men further agreed, and he agreed with them, and so on.

Now, what was the question which I rose to put to the Senator from Kentucky? I do not, of course, claim the right to catechise him or catechise any man as to his individual opinions here or anywhere else; but when a Senator rises and announces to the Senate the purpose of a co-ordinate legislative body, when he adds to that purpose a declaration of his own opinion and purpose, having announced at another time also his opinion of his obligation to act with his political associates, and when that having been commented upon he spends four hours in what he announces at the beginning is the reply to a charge made in the course of that comment, and refuses to be set right when he is going on, I think it proper to call precisely and exactly to his attention what he himself has uttered in debate here, what he has addressed to this body here, and see whether it be revolutionary or not.

Now, I say that in his first speech and in his impassioned reply just now he has declined to tell us whether he sticks to the purpose announced by him in the speech from which I have read, to refuse to make appropriations to carry on this Government. It is not I, it is not any man on this side of the Chamber, who has introduced here the question of the President's veto or the President's signature to legislation; it is he, the Senator from Kentucky, the conferee on the part of the Senate, the reporter of the purpose of the House, who supposed the case first of the Senate refusing to assent to this legislation and declared the purpose of the other body that Congress should adjourn without making appropriations, and then the purpose of the majority in both branches to do the same thing if the President should not agree with them in the legislation. It is that I denounce as usurpation; that I denounce as revolution, not the putting legislation on appropriation bills, not the repeal of any old statute or the enactment of any new statute in the regular and constitutional way; but it is that—the saying to the President, "You shall have no pay, the judges shall have no pay, there shall be no post-office, there shall be no pensions, there shall be no courts, unless, when the Constitution which you have sworn to support says that if you do not approve a bill you shall return it with your objections, you, in obedience to us, not approving it, and in defiance of your own oath, return it with your assent."

Sir, it is a pretty interesting question to the American people to know the purpose of that great party and of the Senator from Kentucky, who is one of its leaders. It is to that point that I address myself.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, one word more. The difficulty about the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, which I did not care about saying before, but he presses it, and presses it with so much earnestness that I will now simply state it, is that it is not the truth. I never said what he asserted that I said, and he cannot find it in the speech that I made, although he professed to read from it. I never said that we would block the wheels of the Government if the President saw fit to veto this bill in the exercise of his constitutional authority. That is the first trouble.

What was it that I said? I read the speech word for word, and there was not a scintilla in it of such a purpose. Now, I will read it again. I said to the Senate in the last Congress that I was very sure that if the Senate refused to accede to these amendments of the House the House would refuse to pass the bill, and an extra session would follow, and I was right. The Senate did refuse, and an extra session did follow. Now I will read again what I said to show that the Senator from Massachusetts designed to put a false question to me and to make me answer a conundrum of his own, which I told him I would not answer because there was nothing in it, and I was not dealing in refining disquisitions about probabilities and possibilities that he seems to be so fond of. His effort reminds me of a remark I once heard cited as having been made by old John Randolph, of Virginia, about two young men who were highly educated in some of the colleges, and who came back and gave him a heap of trouble in the house of burgesses in Virginia. His remark was, that he regretted to say that his young friends were like the lands at the headwaters of the Alleghany—poor by nature and exhausted by cultivation. [Laughter.] That is not my condition, and I do not propose to be refining away anything in that sort of manner.

Now, sir, I say that the words the Senator from Massachusetts put in my mouth I never uttered except in the connection of a failure of the two Houses to agree. In that event, I said that the House of Representatives in my judgment would not recede, and the result would be to force an extra session, because the House would refuse to pass the bill unless the Senate consented to allow the amendments they had placed there to be incorporated in the bill; and it was to induce the Senate, if I could, to recede from their objection to the House amendments and not to force an extra session, and in that connection only, that I used the language which the Senator from Massachusetts has read, and by reading which he professed and sought to make the impression on the Senate and the country that I had said I would refuse to pass necessary appropriation bills even after the President had vetoed these bills. I never said it, and he was seeking to make a false impression, I am afraid; he did make it at least.

Now I will read what I did say. I told the Senate, as a conferee on the part of the Senate, that the House in my judgment would never recede, that the conferees on the part of the Senate had also refused to recede, that we had come to a dead-lock, that the House insisted, and I thought they were right in insisting:

> That the armed soldiers of the United States should not be allowed to approach the polls for the mere purpose of keeping the peace, that there should be an honest jury obtained in the courts of the United States in all cases where the rights and liberties of citizens were involved, and that the States should be allowed to conduct their own elections in their own way, free from all Federal interference, and the democratic conferees on the part of the House seemed determined that unless those rights were secured to the people in the bills sent to the Senate they would refuse, under their constitutional right, to make appropriations to carry on the Government if the dominant majority in the Senate insisted upon the maintenance of these laws and refused to consent to their repeal.

That is what I said, and that is all I said on that subject. Then what did I say about an extra session? I will read word for word, so that the RECORD will show whether I have been making the statements that I am now required to answer categorically, and whether there is any basis for an imaginary revolution gotten up upon an imaginary state of the case attempted to be fastened upon a single person who is only one of seventy-six Senators and two hundred and ninety odd Representatives; and it would take a majority of both to make a revolution, I should think, in legislation. I added, after saying what I have already read:

They seemed further to agree, and I agreed with them, that if an extra session must be called, much as it is to be regretted, the very moment it is called the committees of both Houses would be organized and separate bills would be framed and passed as soon as possible asking the President of the United States to agree with the representatives of the States and people in repealing all laws that authorize the soldiers of the Republic to be sent by any authority whatever to the polls at State elections under the pretense of keeping the peace, and in repealing all laws that prevent men who are by intelligence and interest in the public welfare fit and competent to do justice between citizens and between the United States and citizens in the jury-box from exercising that right, thus depriving the courts the benefit of fair jurors, and they will promptly pass another bill declaring that the United States shall not, either through supervisors, marshals, or deputy marshals, interfere with the States in conducting the elections held within the States. We insist that those matters pertain solely to the States and are part of their absolute right, and that they are perfectly competent to attend to them fairly and honestly. When these three laws are submitted to the President for his approval, as they will be, and are approved by him, as they ought to be, the next Congress will in my opinion be ready to pass every appropriation bill, just as it is now, adjourn, and go home without attempting before next December to perfect any further legislation. If, however, the President of the United States, in the exercise of the power vested in him, should see fit to veto the bills thus presented to him, which I repeat will simply be to keep soldiers from the polls, to allow proper jurors to serve who will try cases honestly, and allow the States to control their own elections, then I have no doubt those same amendments will be again made part of the appropriation bills, and it will be for the President to determine whether he will block the wheels of government and refuse to accept necessary appropriations rather than allow the representatives of the people to repeal odious laws which they regard as subversive of their rights and privileges. We have the undoubted right to repeal them in any form and on any bills we choose. Most of them were imposed upon the country as parts of appropriation bills. Whether that course is right or wrong, it will be adopted, and I have no doubt adhered to, no matter what happens with the appropriation bills.

That is the whole speech that I made, word for word, and there is no threat in it. There was only a statement made to the Senate that if the Senate refused to agree to the provisions inserted in the House bills and insisted on striking them out, the House would probably refuse to pass the bills with those provisions stricken out, and an extra session of Congress must follow. Now, by what authority does the Senator from Massachusetts insist on reading as though I had said that if the President vetoed these bills I had threatened to block the wheels of government? He has put that to me three different times in the last fifteen minutes. Sir, I never said it. He had my speech in his hands and could hardly fail to know that I had never said it. I have read what I said; the country can read it. It was simply urging the Senate to give way, to withdraw their objections to the legislation proposed by the House which I thought was just and fair and honest and right, and agree to it so as to avoid an extra session, for the information I had from the House conferees was that they would not give way; and it turned out that I told the truth; they did not give way, and the extra session has come. As to any threat made by me, there was none further than to state what I had ascertained in the conference of the temper of the House, which turned out to be fully verified.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not propose to be deterred from making my point by any exercise of plantation manners here or elsewhere.

Mr. BECK. That is so original that it ought to be carefully noted!

Mr. HOAR. I read the Senator's language from his speech before. When the Senator undertook to read his speech before, he omitted the part of it which I have read.

Mr. BECK. I beg the Senator's pardon. When I undertook a little while ago to read, I read my final reply.

Mr. HOAR. I understand it. The Senator did not read the language which I read from his speech. He has read it now.

Mr. BECK. Yes; every word of it.

Mr. HOAR. He read it in such a tone of voice and with a hurried flow of words, so that few people could follow him.

Mr. BECK. Read it again. It is a very good speech.

Mr. HOAR. "It is a very good speech," and let us see whether the Senator adheres to it or whether there has been another caucus and he abandons it. The Senator was speaking of the purpose of the House in case a majority of the Senate refused to assent——

Mr. BECK. And the Senator said awhile ago that I was speaking of the purpose in case the President refused to sign! That is what you said.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, nothing would induce me to allow so ungentlemanlike an utterance to pass my lips as to tell a gentleman who was interrupting me to sit down, and I will not say so to the Senator from Kentucky, but I shall be obliged to him for not interrupting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair reminds Senators that in order to address the Senate they must address the Chair before speaking to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. The proposition which the Senator undertook to report from the House and to give his own opinion on was twofold: First, what will the House of Representatives do if the Senate disagree with them about a matter of general legislation? The Constitution requires the assent of three—House, Senate, and President. Now, the first proposition which the Senator from Kentucky undertook to state was, What will the House of Representatives do if the Senate refuse to concur with them in regard to legislation? and he replied:

The democratic conferees on the part of the House seemed determined that unless those rights were secured to the people in the bills sent to the Senate they would refuse, under their constitutional right, to make appropriations to carry on the Government if the dominant majority in the Senate insisted upon the maintenance of these laws and refused to consent to their repeal.

Is that language ambiguous? Did I do injustice to the Senator from Kentucky when I read it from his own speech?

The democratic conferees on the part of the House seemed determined that unless those rights were secured to the people in the bills sent to the Senate they would refuse, under their constitutional right, to make appropriations to carry on the Government if the dominant majority in the Senate insisted upon the maintenance of these laws and refused to consent to their repeal.

That is proposition No. 1. Then, what is to happen if the Senate and House are agreed and the President vetoes the bills?

They seemed further to agree, and I agree with them, that if an extra session must be called, much as it is to be regretted, the very moment it is called the committees of both Houses would be organized and separate bills would be framed and passed as soon as possible asking the President of the United States to agree with the representatives of the States and people in repealing all laws.

Then the Senator states his opinion upon the laws which I will not read, and he proceeds:

When these three laws are submitted to the President for his approval, as they will be, and are approved by him, as they ought to be, the next Congress will in my opinion be ready to pass every appropriation bill, just as it is now, adjourn, and go home without attempting before next December to perfect any further legislation. If, however, the President of the United States, in the exercise of the power vested in him, should see fit to veto the bills thus presented to him, which I repeat will simply be to keep soldiers from the polls, to allow proper jurors to serve who will try cases honestly, and allow the States to control their own elections, then I have no doubt those same amendments will be again made part of the appropriation bills, and it will be for the President to determine whether he will block the wheels of government and refuse to accept necessary appropriations rather than allow the representatives of the people to repeal odious laws which they regard as subversive of their rights and privileges. We have the undoubted right to repeal them in any form and on any bills we choose.

The Senator is speaking of the President's veto in the last sentence, and he adds:

Most of them were imposed upon the country as parts of appropriation bills. Whether that course is right or wrong, it will be adopted, and I have no doubt adhered to, no matter what happens with the appropriation bills.

Now, if the Senator from Kentucky says he did not mean to say that they would not pass appropriation bills unless the President assented to this legislation, of course we must accept his assertion; but nobody else so understood him, nobody else could so understand him, and I do not believe it is possible to frame human language which shall express more clearly to the mind of the country, or of the Senate or of my own, the purpose I imputed to the Senator from Kentucky, than the language which he uttered. Then he was followed by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] who manifestly took that view of it, and who uttered the language which I also quoted from his speech:

We claim the right which the House of Commons in England established after two centuries of contest, to say that we will not grant the money of the people unless there is a redress of grievances.

And the Senator from Kentucky to-day has spent a large part of his speech in showing the peaceful revolution by which, under the unwritten constitution of England, the House of Commons wrested the executive power from the monarch and took it to themselves. Does the Senator from Kentucky mean (and if not, why cite and quote this history?) that we have a right under our written Constitution to wrest the executive power or the veto power from the President of the United States?

I have nothing to say to what is offensive in the language of the Senator from Kentucky. I dealt with his speech; I dealt with its clear, plain, palpable meaning; I dealt with a meaning which I do not believe now he will disavow, and I read the language which, when it was convenient for him to refer to his speech again, he omitted.

If this position as it has been understood, if this position of which this extra session is but the reaffirmance is to be abandoned, the country will be relieved by the prompt, explicit, and intelligible statement of the purpose to abandon it on the part of the Senator from Kentucky and his associates.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, in the House of Representatives, provided by its rules, there is a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in which all matters affecting the Union are discussed and deliberated upon. There is no such committee in this body, but nevertheless, in a larger and a broader sense, the debate of the last two or three weeks in these Halls has been carried on in a committee of the whole upon the state of the Union. The firm conviction has taken hold of the public mind that more than appears upon the surface and is indicated by the particular subject-matter under discussion is the cause of this debate, and that its presence here affects the Union. The Army bill and its provisions, important as they are, are not the cause but the incident of this debate. The excitement which it has produced here and elsewhere is but the blush upon the surface of a fever, the cause of which lies deep and is of long continuance. This bill and its associate are hardly more than floats upon the current, indicating its force and its strength. There has taken hold upon the public mind the conviction that something more and something behind the provisions of these bills impels the current of political affairs here in the Capitol.

This excitement comes upon a country ill-prepared to receive it. Gladly would it avoid it. There is no interest of the country that does not long for peace and quiet. There is no aspiration of the patriot that does not long for the assurance that no danger lies underneath what is going on here at the Capitol. All business interests of the country ask for repose; all earnest men in the country are tired of agitation and of conflict; all men have looked forward to and hoped for peace, reconciliation, pacification.

I have not sought the floor, nor do I intend, if I am able to possess myself, to add to this excitement. No more unpatriotic effort could be indulged in than sounding notes of alarm where there is no occasion for them, except it be that silence of the public servant that fails to give warning of apparent danger.

That problem inherited from the war called reconstruction, lately rechristened pacification, has had many phases in its progress through difficulties and obstacles toward a peaceful and healthy solution. Two or three years ago it was proposed in a fresh effort toward its attainment to turn it over into the hands and control of those who had been instrumental in creating the problem itself. Reconstruction, it was thought, could best be brought about by those most engaged in destruction; pacification could be secured most easily at the hands of those who had disturbed the peace; and the gaping wounds of the war could be stanched and healed only by hands reddest in that blood. The good offices of these men were tendered to this work upon the sole condition that power should be surrendered into their hands to work out this problem. They would themselves assure peace; they would themselves secure to the helpless, unarmed, unprotected freedman every right of the American citizen, but only upon the condition that absolute control should be placed in their hands. A new administration coming into power, trusting to these professions and believing it to be its duty to try each method that presented itself to work out this difficult proposition, accepted these assurances, took these men at their word, not only trusted them, but went into active co-operation with them, clearing the way for their free, unobstructed, and unhindered working out the problem they proposed to undertake. Into their hands and into the hands of men of their own selection was placed power. Every marshal in the districts which composed the disturbed region of country, every district attorney, every executive officer, every postmaster even was selected or rejected according as he was satisfactory to the advocates of this new method of reconstruction and of pacification.

They commenced their work under auspices the most favorable for its accomplishment. The country, if not trusting quite so implicitly the assertions of these men as did the Administration, nevertheless stood by and protected it and them in carrying out faithfully the task. From that day to this no obstacle has been put in their way. They have had no offensive officer thrust upon them; they have had no obstacle of legislation in their path. The country accepted their assurance that if the control of public affairs in those States should be intrusted to them they would work out that peace, that pacification which can come alone from the security and protection of every citizen of the United States in the enjoyment and the exercise of every right guaranteed to him under the Constitution.

No advocate of this plan, no participator in this movement from any quarter, can point to one single obstacle thrown by power or by influence or by adverse criticism or unfriendly legislation of any kind toward the complete fruition of this last method of pacification. It has had its opportunity; it has had its free course and it has run it—and what has been the result? That class of people who constitute the majority in three or four of those States, and a large proportion of the voting population in all the other States composing that number, has been absolutely stripped of every political right, struck dumb, as voiceless as the grave that has closed over many of them in the vain attempt to exercise their rights. Represented in the other branch by more than twenty-five members they have not had a single voice in their selection. They have disappeared from the polls, from political organization, and from the exercise of political rights. They might as well be blotted out of existence, so far as political rights are concerned, except that their numbers form the basis upon which men whom they have had no voice in selecting shall determine in the other House of Congress the policy of this nation.

Not in political rights alone, but in all those other rights which a man in this country holds at the mercy of another when he is without political rights are they as helpless and as defenseless. Deprived of redress in the courts of the United States, baffled and buffeted and kicked out of the courts of the States, trifled with and cheated and starved in contracts they have no power to enforce, hunted to their cabins at night and laid low in death before morning if they resist, the children of Israel in Egypt were in a better condition than they. Despair has taken possession of them and hope has fled, and an exodus like unto that of the children of Israel is being presented to the American people at this moment as the commentary upon this work intrusted to these new reconstructors, upon the solemn assurance that every right, political and personal, should be secured to the humblest and the weakest of all the citizens within their borders.

These are the facts, Mr. President. This thus far is the result. This is what disappoints the patriotic public putting its trust in such promises. This is all the pacification they have given us. But, sir, they did not undertake the experiment for this result alone. It was not merely to prostrate at the feet of men who declare they are the natural rulers of those States this humble, this weak and defenseless people, but for deeper reasons. It was to obtain in the House of Representatives and here, for another purpose, a power not otherwise attainable. Of the twenty-five representatives of the colored race in these States now holding the balance of power in the House of Representatives, as I have said, not a colored man has had a voice in the selection. Not one of these men would hold that place had the pledges of those who were intrusted with power been carried out. For what it was sought, what was the purpose beyond and deeper than the surface, is the inquiry about which the American people are at this moment so anxious and toward which I desire to ask your attention for a few moments. What is this purpose? Three distinct propositions have been announced upon this floor which taken together are the key to this whole plan. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] announced, first, that the republican side of this House might understand first as well as last that they were to have no more voice in the legislation in this Hall. That is the first proposition. The next is, that when the democratic majority in Congress have determined upon a line of policy it is to be taken as a whole, without alteration or modification at any other hand. The third is, that the democratic party will take its measures from a caucus. It follows then as the logic of these three statements that a caucus is hereafter to determine the policy of this Government, that in the secret conclave of a caucus is to be discovered this purpose, and the future of the legislation and administration of public affairs.

What caucus, Mr. President? A caucus in which these men of whom I have been speaking have the absolute control. A caucus in which a large majority were unable to take the oath at the Vice-President's desk that they had not themselves personally been engaged in an attempt to overthrow the Government itself, has come by surrender of the democratic party into the control of all power and of all legislation in these two branches. So it follows that the men who were able by their failure to carry out their pledges to protect in the exercise of their rights the colored race of the South, to plant their majority in the House of Representatives, have had surrendered to them, according to the public announcement of the democratic party here, the shaping, the determining, and the fixing the policy and purpose of the Government. They have not left us to doubt, to conjecture, what their purpose is. Too plainly is it indicated upon the records of the two Houses of Congress and the official utterances of members of this and the other body. We were told the other day, exultingly, and with good reason was it said exultingly, that those men who could not at your desk take the oath that they had not undertaken themselves to overthrow this Government were not only in the majority here but they had come to stay. We were told in the same breath that when in 1861 they left these seats it was a mistake, a blunder. A mistake of what, a blunder in what? A mistake not of principle but in strategy; that in going out from these seats into a war upon the life of this nation they were actuated by as high and patriotic and noble purposes as ever actuated man under the sun; but that their mistake of strategy was that they sought by going out and by war to accomplish what failing to do they might just as well and more safely have accomplished here. We were told by the same gentlemen when speaking in another place, and using substantially the same language, that when they went out they carried the Constitution with them and went out in its defense against those who remained here, who were its enemies; that they had come back to teach those who had remained their duty to the Constitution.

Now, sir, that leaves nothing for conjecture. That is clear and explicit. That means, if it means anything, that they have come back to assert and maintain in these Halls that interpretation of the Constitution for which they made the strategic blunder of leaving these seats. Avoiding in the future the mistake they made in the past, they are here to work out in these Halls that kind of government under the forms of this Constitution they went to Montgomery to establish and to maintain by force of arms.

We were told not long ago that they had come back to accomplish by the ballot what they had failed to accomplish by the bullet, and that is, to establish under this Dome and under the form and words in this Constitution that interpretation of it which in 1832 South Carolina declared authorized her to nullify any act of Congress which in her judgment she disapproved, that interpretation of it which Jefferson Davis and his followers taking their departure from these seats and those in the other Hall went forth to establish upon the field of battle. We were told at the same time that "You may call this rebellion if you please; we will appeal to the future for the interpretation of our acts to determine whether it be rebellion or not."

Sir, here underlies the moving power which controls this debate. No sooner had these men come into power in the other branch, not waiting for control here, than they filled the files of Congress with schemes and plans in the form of legislation and of amendments to the Constitution as clearly indicating this line of purpose as is the course of the sun marked out in its orbit. Bill after bill was introduced. I have one here before me stripping the courts of the United States of all power to protect its officers in the collection of its customs duties, surrendering to the State at its pleasure the question whether the revenues of the United States shall be collected at all or not; another, taking from the courts of the United States the power to enforce any contract made by any county or municipal organization in all these States, the Constitution relieving the States from being sued in the United States court. Here in my hand is another, which, if it becomes a law, relieves all the political organizations from the enforcement of a single one of their obligations of whatever kind in the courts of the United States and turning them over to the State courts alone for enforcement; another, still, claiming compensation for some losses sustained by some individual resident of one of these States, incurred, as the bill says, "in the late unhappy war between the States;" another, providing that when the time shall come that they shall have in their power the last of the three co-ordinate branches of this Government they can fill every office in the Army of the United States with the men who led the forces upon the field of battle in the war for their destruction. In the very bill under consideration is the provision that till then there shall be no more promotions in the Army as it is, so that for these two years there shall be made, as fast as casualties and other means may bring it about, vacancies to be filled by men who carried the flag of the enemy in the war upon the country. They had not been in power in the House of Representatives a month before they struck at the Army itself and undertook to reduce it to ten thousand men; and nothing but the necessities of the border of Texas bringing to the rescue of this Army the Representatives of that State in the last Congress saved it, so far as the men who dominate and give purpose and character to legislation in that Hall then and in this now was concerned, from the beggarly measure of ten thousand men. That, along with this bill which I have before me, which repeals that section of the Revised Statutes which keeps from the command of the armies of the United States those men who led and commanded the forces of the rebellion against it, tell the story so far as the Army is concerned.

But, sir, this is not all. The Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has already called your attention to the open and avowed purpose of the men who by dictation of the caucus commend the measures which command the majority in these bodies. They have openly avowed that they have come back to stay for the purpose of wiping out every vestige of the legislation for the last eighteen years growing out of the war. The Senator from Kentucky not now in his seat [Mr. BECK] avowed it here. I remember to have heard at an earlier day a distinguished member of the democratic party in the other House, when the inquiry was put to him, "What will you do when you come back into power?" make the significant answer, "Do! we will undo all that you republicans have done since 1861."

Sir, the present condition of things, the purpose underlying all this measure, takes strength, is formidable, only as it stands upon the down-trodden and destroyed franchise of those people who were delivered over to the assurances and covenants of the very men who brought this evil upon the country. It dates directly back to the day when power over them was delivered into the hands of their original oppressors.

Mr. President, in the light of all that has taken place since flagrant war ceased at Appomattox Court House, in the light of the avowed purpose of those who shape the course of legislation and of political events here, it becomes significant to call attention to the fact that without the three constitutional amendments, which were a part of the work of the republican party since 1861, the condition of things to-day would differ only in name from the condition of things before the war. Clearer than ever to-day stand out the necessity and the wisdom of those amendments; and the regret in the mind of every patriot looking earnestly and anxiously upon the drift of public events is not in their enactment but in the fact that they fell so far short of accomplishing the true and legitimate results of that war. Just so far as subsequent events have enabled those now in power to trample under foot the political rights of four millions of people unable to assert and defend their exercise, just so far those constitutional amendments have fallen short of the accomplishment of the true result. Were it not for them the true interpretation of the present drift and current of political power leads to the restoration of matters to the condition before the war.

Look on that spectacle in this body, the struggle all night long, successful in the gray of the morning only by a single vote, in preventing the passage of a law for the pensioning of Jefferson Davis, the head and the front and the leader of the rebellion itself, in the face of the declaration from those now dominating in this Hall that the very effort itself was a wanton insult to those who control legislation here.

It was, Mr. President, a fitting counterpart to this proceeding that that caucus, controlled, as I have said, by an overwhelming majority of those who cannot take an oath that they have not made war upon the Government itself, should place in the hands of the vice-president of the confederacy the duty of formulating into words the purposes and policy of the future of that party. Pension the chief of the confederacy at this end of the Capitol upon pain of inflicting a wanton insult upon those who are to shape the course of legislation hereafter, and at the other end of the Capitol give to the vice-president of that confederacy the high duty of expressing in words the future policy and purposes of the same party, and very little else is left to complete the picture and the work.

Little further is wanting to show what the purpose of this party is. I do not care to call attention to the fact that this Government is called, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] called it the other day, a confederacy of States. Nor do I care to allude to what slipped from the tongue of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] when he spoke of this "confederate Senate."

Mr. EATON. Will my friend pardon me one moment? Is not this a confederacy of States; and did not Daniel Webster of Massachusetts pronounce it to be a confederacy of States?

Mr. DAWES. I do not know. I know that the Constitution makes it a nation and not a mere confederacy of States.

Mr. EATON. It would be well to learn before the Senator charges me with something monstrous.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know whether Daniel Webster called it a confederacy of States; I know the Senator from Connecticut did.

Mr. EATON. I did; and I shall do so a great many times more if I live.

Mr. DAWES. Very likely. I know that that is the language used by those who say they have come back here to accomplish under the forms of legislation what they tried but failed to accomplish on the battle-field, namely, to establish their right to leave this Government peaceably whenever they choose—the right to make the States sovereign over the United States Government. If anything was settled by the war, so settled that it will never be unsettled even by the temporary ascendency in these two Houses of those who sought to make another government of it, it was settled that a State could not peaceably secede from this Union, and that this is a nation, a union of States, not an association of them. It is still true that this is the Congress of the United States, not of the Confederate States, of America.

Sir, I was about to say that the bill before the Senate is defended upon the open and avowed ground that there is no such thing as the peace of the United States; that there is no authority of the United States in any State in this Union over and above the authority of the State, the infraction of which is a disturbance of the peace of the United States. I think that that embraces the entire doctrine of State sovereignty. I do not see that anything is left that could be desired by John C. Calhoun himself. If there be no enactment of the Congress of the United States under the Constitution to be executed within the limits of a State that this Government has any power to enforce, so that the violation of it is a disturbance of the peace of the United States, then I do not know wherein the United States in any matter is sovereign over the authority of the State; and yet, without qualification and without limitation, it is declared to be the basis upon which this bill rests that there can be under this Government no such thing as the peace of the United States to violate, to disturb, to overthrow, or to keep, as my colleague suggests.

Now, sir, take the single provision around which all this legislation hinges. The office of Representative in Congress is the creation of the United States Constitution. It does not exist if the Constitution of the United States has not created it. Its existence does not depend upon the slightest authority from the State. The Constitution of the United States has prescribed the qualification of the voter for a Representative in Congress as clearly, as explicitly, and as definitely as if it had written it out in so many words. The qualification for a voter to this national office, the Constitution says, shall be in each State precisely the same, and not otherwise, as the qualifications of a voter for the most numerous branch of the Legislature of that State. Those qualifications, therefore, are defined in words. The State without the consent of Congress can neither appoint the time for the election of a member of Congress, nor the manner of casting the ballot prescribed by the Constitution, nor the place at which it shall be deposited. The fixing of the time for depositing it the Constitution has reposed in Congress; the prescription of the manner of depositing it is reposed in Congress; the naming of the place at which it is deposited is reposed in Congress if Congress chooses to exert the power. They can make the time for the election of a member of Congress coincide with that of the State election, or they can prohibit its being done at the time of the State election. It is in their power to establish in the State of New York, or Ohio, or Maryland the election of a member of Congress on the 4th day of July, if they choose. They can prescribe every duty to be performed, and the manner of doing it at a time when there shall be no State election or State officer with authority to appear at that point. And yet in the name of that State-rights doctrine that has come back here to dominate and to shape the future policy of this Government, we are told that it is not in the power of the United States to enforce its own laws in the election of its own officer according to the qualifications it has itself prescribed, but that that belongs to the State!

Why, sir, nothing is clearer than that the Supreme Court of the United States in Prigg vs. Pennsylvania have decided that it is not in the power of the United States to require of a State officer the exercise of any such authority. If the United States had declared in a statute that it should be the duty of any designated State officer to keep the peace at the polls, it would be absolutely voluntary on the part of that officer to do or to omit to do what Congress should attempt to require of him to do. So that the doctrine promulgated as the basis of the disputed provisions of this bill is that the United States has created an office, an elective office, has prescribed the qualifications of the voter for it, has determined the time, the place, and the manner of depositing that vote, and is utterly powerless not only to enforce its provisions but to require any State officer to do the same.

I have but to repeat the inquiry I have just made, what further is necessary to complete the domination of State sovereignty over the power of the United States, striking it in this its most vital and essential organ, but thus to strip it of the power to select and to secure the election according to constitutional qualifications and rights of the members of the most numerous branch of its Legislature, without which of itself the Government falls to the ground?

Sir, there is something about these measures which have in them features peculiar. There is a bitter irony in what we hear said, from the quarter whence it comes, of the freedom and the purity of the ballot. There is something malapropos, something incongruous, in a majority of a legislative body that, had it not been for the rifle-club and the tissue ballot, would have been in a helpless and hopeless and powerless minority, standing upon the outraged franchise of three million people and crying out for the freedom and the purity of the ballot. Sir, in this debate I bow to that parliamentary requirement which commands silence in respect to what is being transacted or said in the House of Representatives, and therefore I can only say that if I were indebted for a seat in either House of Congress to the silencing of a majority of more than five thousand weak, helpless, unprotected citizens, silenced by the rifle-club and the tissue ballot, it would be a good while before I would whine because I had been deprived of the right to buy and sell that majority as in olden times or prate about the purity of the ballot-box; it would be a good while before I should use any such language as this:

> It was this same party that by a single stroke of legislation reversed the natural order of things in one-third of this continent, and by a fatal blind policy reduced to desolation and degradation and bankruptcy and beggary nine sovereign States of this Union. And after visiting these indescribable calamities upon a people who were forced to look on with impotent anguish and wordless ire while darkness more profound threatened to eclipse their civilization, and while returning justice was about regaining the ascending scale, they quartered their troops wherever they dared, constituted in States that were once free the corporal of the guard chairman of the board of managers of election, and menaced with bayonets the returning boards of certain States that the votes might be registered as the pretor demanded. The suppression of the free and untrammeled voice of the people in their national elections in certain States for years past has no parallel save when the pretorian guards of Rome dictated the choice of a Roman emperor.

I say, sir, that if I assumed to represent in the Halls of Congress the city of Charleston and was indebted for that place to my ability to stand upon the back of five thousand majority of poor, helpless citizens of the United States, silenced as with the stillness of death by the rifle-club and the tissue-ballot, I would wait awhile or let somebody else use that language.

If my friends on the other side will take a little advice from me, I will suggest to them that they had better wait before talking any more about the freedom and the purity of the ballot-box, until it shall have been forgotten how in 1868 they snowed under sixteen thousand republican majority in the State of New York in accordance with the circular sent out beforehand in the name of their great chief, Samuel J. Tilden, so secretly that he did not know anything about it any more than he knows about every other political iniquity which has been transacted since in his name and in his house!

Sir, there is nothing like it, no assurance equal to it, except that of their other great leader famous for quoting scripture who when he was sick was so anxious to take holy orders, and forgot it as soon as he was well!

Let me further call attention to some of the provisions of the very bill around which this whole debate hinges. I have already called attention to the fact that it is supported on the ground that the United States has no peace to keep, that there can be no such thing as a breach of the peace of the United States. Without that these provisions cannot stand one moment. If the United States has a peace to keep, everything else provided in this bill stands to-day in the existing law. The United States soldier can appear at the polls now for no other purpose under heaven but to keep the peace. For every other purpose, if this bill passes, the penalty will be precisely the same that it is to-day. The pretense of this bill is that it is to prevent United States soldiers from intimidating voters. The penalty for that is precisely the same upon the statute-book now that it will be when this bill becomes a law. If any United States soldier ever has or under existing law ever does approach the polls within two miles for the purpose of intimidation, he incurs now exactly the same penalty that he will do when this bill passes. So it is not for that that this bill is to be enacted; it is not to prevent intimidation at the polls because it throws no single additional safeguard around a voter to protect him from intimidation at the polls. He is just as much exposed to intimidation by the soldier when this bill passes as he is to-day. So tell us no more that this bill is designed to prevent intimidation at the polls. Why do you not put an additional penalty? Why do you not describe the intimidation in some other way? Why do you not define the offense in some broader words? No; you take precisely the same words and you affix precisely the same penalty for intimidation that stands to-day and has stood for fourteen years in the statute-books of the United States.

And when my friend from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] answered the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] that he saw in 1870 soldiers about the polls for the purpose of intimidation, he saw them doing that which was a penitentiary offense then, and if repeated after this bill passes will be no more so.

It is idle folly, false pretense, for what you do attests more clearly your purpose than what you profess. The only new thing, the only act to which a new penalty is to be attached when this bill becomes a law is the attempt to keep the peace at the polls, not any other act.

So, Mr. President, it is the logic of the announcement elsewhere that this bill really rests for its essential provision upon that startling announcement that there is no peace of the United States to be kept, and therefore that he who attempts to keep the peace of the United States may well be sent to the penitentiary for it.

Mr. President, if I may allude to what has passed in debate cursorily here, I do it only in further elucidation of the one single point to which I have desired to draw the attention of the Senate that this whole movement seeks but to establish in power the sovereignty of the States. What has fallen from the Senator from Kentucky in his long argument, when condensed and set to the music of these times, is simply the one tune—the United States is to be stripped by degrees, slowly but effectually, of all its power in the States. He tells you that when a United States officer is to be elected to a United States office, to discharge the functions of a legislator of the United States, this election must be taken out from under the control of the United States and placed under the control of the State itself. Well, sir, ten of these States were once in a position to illustrate that proposition, and I commend to the Senator, who to his honor be it said took no part in that grand but fatal experiment, the application of it; I commend to him the interrogatory I put in all good faith and earnestness: if that be true does the life of the nation depend upon itself or upon the will of the State? Is he able from his fresh study of the philosophy of State sovereignty to formulate in words more effective, more certain or inevitable, the consequence that the Government of the United States depends upon the will of the States for consent to live?

I do not desire to follow him in all that he has said, much less do I desire to criticise that impassioned effort to contrast southern Senators on that side, in their personal character and worth, with some of those who have held their seats before them. There had been nothing in the debate hitherto that justified that course of argument. No man on this side of the Chamber had alluded disparagingly to any Senator on that side. The man who, following his sincere convictions, takes his life in his hands and goes forth to maintain those convictions upon the field of battle, although I may consider what he has done as a terrible crime against his Government, nevertheless commands and has received my respect far more than the paltry coward who, sympathizing with him in his heart, has not the courage to follow him, but aids and abets him at home to the limit of personal safety.

My friend knows that I make no personal application of this. He and I have served together in both branches of Congress with both these classes, and I believe our sentiments in respect to them both are in no wise different. But if the Senator means by these frequent, these repeated assurances of a matter denied nowhere, that we are peers, I submit to him that silent recognition of the fact that we are peers here on this floor is more becoming than the ostentatious assertion of it continually upon parade. When the old order of things, now so near restored, prevailed here, we were wont to hear, not occasionally as we have lately as if to get us used to the new order of things, but continually of the superiority of the men who owned their fellowmen and represented them in the two Halls of Congress. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will stop short of that. But I find in these frequent allusions indications all the same way. If the old order of things is to be restored as far as the constitutional amendments will permit it to be, then of course this line of talk on the other side is most natural.

The Senator wanted to know, in language borrowed from that same period, why republicans did not have colored men as their representatives. I heard it stated more pointedly in another place not a week ago. The inquiry was made of a New England Representative whether it were not true that in Massachusetts and Maine there were cultivated and educated and able negro men, followed by the inquiry, why do you not send them to Congress before you allude to the fact that there are no colored Representatives upon this floor? Sir, when New England cheats a colored candidate for office, be it Representative to Congress or any other, out of his fair and honest election, it will be time enough for those to reproach us who have driven from the Halls of Congress the natural representatives of four million people. The complaint against you is not that you do not choose to send black men as your Representatives. If any constituency in the Southern States, be it overwhelmingly black or overwhelmingly white, chooses to send a white Representative instead of a black one, no man has a right to complain; but when they stamp out the black Representative chosen by thousands of majority and install, by violence and bloodshed and tissue ballots, in his place a white Representative, the significance of the act is its condemnation.

Mr. President, I will detain the Senate no longer. I do not know that anything I have said here to-day will be read by any portion of the people of Massachusetts. They will regret as much as I regret any occasion for these utterances. They have long hoped that that pacification which can come alone from security in the enjoyment of every political and personal right was about to be realized. When this experiment of trusting this work to the very men who came so near working the overthrow of the Government was about to be tried, they gave it their support. They hoped, if they did not absolutely believe, that it would be realized. As one of her representatives here I took some part in assuring her that this confidence was not about to be misplaced; but whether it was or not it was our duty to see to it that it was fairly tried, and that its failure should in no part be ascribed to any withholding of support on our part. But in common with my colleagues, I assured the people of Massachusetts that this was solely upon the pledge that every human right guaranteed by the Constitution and its amendments to the humblest and to all the people of those States was to be observed and its exercise protected, and that the first indication that these rights were to fail of protection would be the signal for the denunciation of this plan and the withdrawal of our support. I pledged myself that at the first indication of it I would sound the alarm. I am here this day to redeem that pledge. They have trusted me here as a sentinel these many years. I have watched in their interest all the phases of this wonderful revolution. Before the war, when those who have now come back to accomplish through the forms of law in these seats that which they made the mistake of going out to accomplish took their leave of this body and the other, I listened to their exultant and defiant farewells. Watching in the interest of that State the progress of events from that day to this, I am conscious that I have no other claim upon its confidence except that I tell it the truth. And here and now I tell the people of Massachusetts that the men into whose hands was intrusted this great work of pacification have prostituted it, and upon the back of the crushed and destroyed citizenship of three or four million people they have strode into power in these Halls and openly and defiantly proclaimed that they have begun anew here the work they made the mistake of attempting to accomplish outside of these seats. The people of Massachusetts when forewarned are forearmed; and their position here and now, like that which they took first and foremost in 1861, will be in the van and in the lead of that determined, irresistible opposition here, and under the forms of law, to that work which they contributed their full share in defeating on the field of battle. I have for one no apprehension of the result. He who brought us over will sustain us. He who planted upon the bleak shores of North America the principles that triumphed at Appomattox Court House will sustain the people of this Union in this coming struggle for their maintenance.

Mr. MORGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the honorable Senator yield to me a moment, and only for a moment? I do not know that it is a matter of any importance whatever, but the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON,] in a little interruption of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] said that Mr. Webster had defined this Government as a "confederacy," if I understood him aright.

Mr. EATON. I did not use any language of that sort.

Mr. BLAINE. What did the honorable Senator say?

Mr. EATON. The Senator from Massachusetts said that I called this a confederacy of States. I asked him if he knew that Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, had used the same language.

Mr. BLAINE. Not that we have heard.

Mr. EATON. Of which I had heard. He probably had not heard of Mr. Webster's use of that language.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator say that Mr. Webster called this Government "a confederacy of States?"

Mr. EATON. I said that Mr. Webster called this "a confederacy of States." I say he called it not only a confederacy of States, but a confederation of States. He used those two terms again and again.

Mr. BLAINE. It is very probable that he did——

Mr. EATON. I know he did.

Mr. BLAINE. But I will proceed to read what Mr. Webster did say on a very momentous occasion, and then I will ask the honorable Senator from Connecticut to tell me when and where Mr. Webster ever said anything in contradiction of it. In the third speech that Mr. Webster made, his last and closing remarks on Foot's famous resolution, he said, alluding to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, Mr. Hayne:

> When the gentleman says the Constitution is a compact between the States, he uses language exactly applicable to the old confederation. He speaks as if he were in Congress before 1789. He describes fully that old state of things then existing. The confederation was, in strictness, a compact; the States, as States, were parties to it. We had no other General Government. But that was found insufficient and inadequate to the public exigencies. The people were not satisfied with it, and undertook to establish a better. They undertook to form a general government which should stand on a new basis; not a confederacy, not a league, not a compact between States, but a constitution; a popular government, founded in popular election, directly responsible to the people themselves, and divided into branches with prescribed limits of power and prescribed duties.

That is what Mr. Webster said.

Mr. EATON. One moment.

Mr. BLAINE. "Not a confederacy."

Mr. EATON. When he reads a few words from a certain speech of Mr. Webster does the honorable Senator from Maine undertake to deny on this floor that Mr. Webster did not again and again call this Government not only a confederation of States but a compact between States? I say he did.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Webster says distinctly here that it is not that.

Mr. EATON. My dear sir, as my friend from Illinois sometimes says——

Mr. BLAINE. Address the President.

Mr. EATON. Has it come to this that the honorable Senator from Maine brings in here one speech and undertakes to say to me that that is all Daniel Webster ever said with regard to this Government, the Constitution, the confederacy, and the compact? When the proper time arrives—I have not the library of Mr. Webster in my pocket, I do not carry it around with me [laughter]—when the proper time arrives I will show that Mr. Webster called this a confederacy and the Constitution a compact.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me read further. Evidently the honorable Senator from Connecticut does not carry the library of Daniel Webster in his pocket; it is still more evident that he does not carry it in his memory. Now, I will read from another speech in reply to the other and still more distinguished Senator from South Carolina, Mr. Calhoun. Mr. Webster said:

> And now, sir, against all these theories and opinions—

Theories and opinions that are receiving fresh and new light on this floor, and I am sorry that a Senator from New England joins with them——

Mr. EATON. You should be glad.

Mr. BLAINE.

> And now, sir—

Says Mr. Webster—

> against all these theories and opinions, I maintain—
> 1. That the Constitution of the United States is not a league, confederacy, or compact between the people of the several States in their sovereign capacities, but a government proper, founded on the adoption of the people, and creating direct relations between itself and individuals.

Mr. Webster was not a gentleman that talked very loosely, and if the Senator will find in all the six volumes of his speeches and in the speeches made by him not included in these six volumes any place where he ever intimated that this was a "confederacy" or a "compact" between the States, I will be glad to hear him read it on the floor of the Senate. Why, sir, the question of a "confederacy" was the very pith and gravamen of that great controversy in 1830-'32; it was the very foundation of the different theories that wage war on this floor to-day; it was the dividing line between those who thought there was a war between States and those who thought there was a war between rebellious citizens and the Union of the States. Does the Senator know that? Bills are introduced in Congress now talking about "the late unhappy war between the States." There was no such war. There was a war between the rebellious citizens of this Union against the Government of this Union; and Mr. Webster never said one word, in my judgment, that will sustain for a single moment any other theory of the Government than that.

Mr. EATON. Do not go into an argument about the war. Do not raise the bloody shirt a moment. Does the Senator from Maine deny that Mr. Webster at any time called this Constitution a compact? Do not read one speech alone.

Mr. BLAINE. I have read two.

Mr. EATON. Does the Senator from Maine deny that Mr. Webster used that language? The honorable Senator from Maine does not carry around in his pocket the speeches of Daniel Webster any more than I do. He is not prepared to deny it.

Mr. BLAINE. I have read that Mr. Webster distinctly, on two great and solemn occasions, denied that this Union was a confederacy, denied that it was a compact. Whether the Senator may find some other speech where Mr. Webster some time or other, by a lapsus linguæ or in some incidental way, may have used the word "confederacy" I do not know. I have not all Mr. Webster's speeches before me; but when Mr. Webster was laying down the principles on which this Government rested he took as the very corner-stone the declaration that this was not "a confederacy." When the Senator asks me the question which he now repeats it seems to me to be "paltering in a double sense" and trifling with the dignity of the subject. When the Senator brings in Mr. Webster's declaration it will be time enough for him to assume a little air of confidence in the mode in which he puts the interrogatory. I have brought him the declaration of Mr. Webster twice made that this Union is not a "confederacy." Let the honorable Senator bring forward the other declaration of Mr. Webster.

Mr. EATON. I will.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. GARLAND. With the understanding that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has the floor, if he gives way now, I move that we go into executive session.

Mr. WITHERS. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. GARLAND. Certainly.

Mr. WITHERS. I merely wish to make a statement. I had hoped that we should have been able to arrive at a vote upon the pending bill during the present week; but the very wide range which the debate has taken has satisfied me that it is impracticable to do so. I wish, however, to give notice now that I shall ask the Senate to insist that the days hereafter shall be consumed in the discussion of this question, and that we shall not adjourn until a later hour than we have heretofore observed for our adjournment. I also hope that by the middle of the ensuing week at least we shall be enabled to have a vote upon the subject, unless one shall sooner be reached.

SENATOR FROM SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. DAWES during his speech yielded to Mr. BUTLER.

Mr. BUTLER. My colleague [Mr. WADE HAMPTON] is in the Chamber and prepared to take the oath of office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator-elect from the State of South Carolina will please come forward for that purpose.

Mr. HAMPTON advanced to the Vice-President's desk, escorted by Mr. BUTLER, and the oath prescribed by the act of July 11, 1868, having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following order:

Ordered, That J. S. Brown & Brother have leave to withdraw their papers on the files of the Secretary of the Senate by leaving copies thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there an adverse report?

Mr. TELLER. No, sir; a favorable report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the order will be made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GARLAND. Now I move that we proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 16, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ELECTION CONTEST—HARALSON VS. SHELLEY.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to present to the House some papers in the contested-election case of Haralson vs. Shelley. These papers were directed to the chairman of the Committee of Elections, instead of being directed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives; and as they have come to me, I can only get them before the committee by presenting them in this way that the House may refer them to the committee.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the papers presented by the gentleman will be referred to the Committee of Elections.

There was no objection.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. HULL. I ask consent of the House that Judge Jared Patchen, a member of the Legislature of the State of Florida, be allowed the privileges of the floor of the House for ten days from this date.

Mr. KELLEY. I enlarge the gentleman's request by asking that those members of State Legislatures for whom such leave has heretofore been asked be also admitted.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JAMES. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference. It proposes to authorize the conveyance of certain lands of the United States to the State of New York. That State is building a railroad to connect one of its prisons with Lake Champlain, and the United States own a strip of land along the shore which it is proposed to convey for this purpose. The bill was favorably acted on by committees of both Houses in the last Congress.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER and others objected.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to present a joint resolution of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Illinois for reference to the Committee on Commerce.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at ten minutes past twelve o'clock. The call rests with the Select Committee on the Origin, Introduction, and Prevention of Epidemic Diseases in the United States.

Mr. ATKINS. Is the rule mandatory that we shall have a morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The rules provide the manner in which the morning hour may be dispensed with.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. STEPHENS. I trust we shall have a morning hour, so that the call of committees may proceed. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has in readiness a unanimous report which I wish to present.

Mr. ATKINS. I withdraw my motion.

NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The Select Committee on the Origin, Introduction, and Prevention of Epidemic Diseases in the United States have directed me to report a joint resolution relating to the organization of the National Board of Health; but as there is on the Speaker's table a joint resolution of the same purport, I ask unanimous consent that the latter be substituted for the House resolution.

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman ask the present consideration of this resolution?

The SPEAKER. He does.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The object of the resolution is to correct an oversight on the part of members of the National Board of Health, who omitted to be sworn in until five days after their appointment, so that there is doubt whether their action previous to that time will be valid.

The SPEAKER. The resolution of the Senate will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) relating to the organization of the National Board of Health.

Whereas the National Board of Health met in Washington on Tuesday, the 1st of April, 1879, and proceeded immediately to organize and act under the law establishing such board, and so continued from day to day until Saturday, the 5th of said month; and

Whereas the members in attendance who have been appointed on such board by the President, through inadvertence failed to take the oath of office prescribed by law, whereby the validity of the previous action of such board has been brought in question: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That such organization and action be, and the same is hereby, ratified, and that the members of such board shall be entitled to compensation just as if they had been duly qualified previously to entering upon their duties.

Mr. CONGER. That provides they shall, before compensation is made, take the oath.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Yes; the law required they should take the oath before they could receive compensation, but they omitted to do it for five days.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the substitution, and the Senate joint resolution will be taken up.

The Senate joint resolution was taken up, read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERCHANGE OF SUBSIDIARY COINS.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures to report a bill (H. R. No. 4) to provide for the interchange of subsidiary coins for legal-tender money under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $20. I ask the Clerk to read the accompanying report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to whom was referred the petition of the New York Gas-Light Company——

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, if the reading of the report is to be considered as discussion, then I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan reserves all points of order. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to whom was referred the petition of the New York Gas-Light Company, Samuel Carter, and divers other citizens of New York, asking their Senators and Representatives in Congress to pass a bill at the earliest possible day for the interchange of subsidiary coins and United States notes, have had the subjects embraced in said petition under consideration and report a bill, herewith submitted, which they think will remedy the evils complained of and accomplish the objects of the petitioners.

Mr. STEPHENS. Now read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to provide for the exchange of subsidiary coins for legal-tender money under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $20.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted, &c., That the holder of any of the silver coins of the United States of smaller denominations than $1 may, on presentation of the same in sums of $10 or any multiple thereof at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, receive therefor United States legal-tender money.

SEC. 2. That the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States who may receive any coins under the provisions of this act, shall exchange the same in sums of $10 or any multiple thereof for United States legal-tender money on demand of any holder thereof.

SEC. 3. That the present fractional or subsidiary silver coins shall hereafter be a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $10 in full payment, and shall be taken up and legal-tender money given in exchange for them when presented to the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in sums of $10 or any multiple thereof.

SEC. 4. That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a question of order, and the point I make is, the House has not referred that subject to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and they have no right to report until such reference has been made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause Rule 131 to be read and afterward Rule 148.

The Clerk read as follows:

OF PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

131. Members having petitions and memorials to present may hand them to the Clerk, indorsing the same with their names, and the reference or disposition to be made thereof; and such petitions and memorials shall be entered on the Journal, subject to the control and direction of the Speaker, and if any petition or memorial be so handed in which, in the judgment of the Speaker, is excluded by the rules, the same shall be returned to the member from whom it was received.

148. An additional standing committee shall be appointed at the commencement of each Congress, whose duties shall continue until the first session of the ensuing Congress, to consist of seven members, to be entitled a "Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures;" and to this committee shall be referred all bills, resolutions, and communications to the House upon that subject.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to speak on the point of order?

Mr. CONGER. I do not; I only want a decision.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not except to have the petition read in order to show the subject-matter went properly to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The petition had better be read.

Mr. STEPHENS. The petition sets forth a copy of the bill of Senator BOOTH, and the petitioners ask that it be passed. The petition is signed by seventy or eighty of the leading citizens of the city of New York.

Mr. CONGER. I perhaps ought to say, although I presume the Chair sees the importance of it, that if a petition accompanied by a bill put in in the ordinary way of sending petitions can be made the foundation by decision of this question for the introduction of all and any measures, giving jurisdiction to the committee to which they are referred without any action on the part of the House, then I submit to the Chair, the entire course of legislative proceedings, the entire object of the rules of the House in regard to the introduction of bills, and the control of subject-matters by the House will be changed. I speak of it not because I care personally what the decision may be, but I am satisfied if the decision sustains this mode of action the House will be compelled soon to alter the rule. If we conform, however, to the old practice under the rules this House then will have control of its own business. This House sends to the committee bills. This House has something to say about the manner of its business; and the business does not creep in in some other way.

Now, as I remarked, I have nothing to say upon this point, because it seems to me the Chair must understand what the result of a decision that any bill and all bills accompanying a petition, and referred by an individual to a committee—what the effect of it must be upon the business of the House. I make these remarks that the Chair, and the House too, may see that a rule had better not be made or altered or a decision made in the interest of some particular, local, or temporary subject and to the entire change and discomfiture of the practice of the House hitherto under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question: whether this petition was regularly referred through the box?

Mr. STEPHENS. It was.

The SPEAKER. It seems not to have any other indorsement than "S. B. Chittenden, February 7, 1879."

Mr. STEPHENS. The indorsement slipped off in the committee this morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to have that indorsement, so as to have the record accurate; and in fact it may be a material point in the question of order.

Mr. REED. I do not feel any special interest in the matter to be decided, but perhaps it may be proper in me to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that in Rule 148 it is declared that "all bills, resolutions, and communications to the House," shall be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. The rules in regard to the other committees name "petitions," while this does not. I do not know whether the Speaker will construe the term "communication" as covering petitions or not, but I think it proper as this is a matter of some importance to call the attention of the Chair to that fact.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. One moment. The indorsement is in usual form.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to Rule 131. It seems to me that the objection made by the gentleman from Michigan cannot prevail. According to the practice which has obtained in the House as to petitions and the mode and manner of their presentation, it has been customary ever since I have been in Congress for petitions to be placed in the box and presented in that way. The rule to which I refer reads as follows:

131. Members having petitions and memorials to present may hand them to the Clerk, indorsing the same with their names, and the reference or disposition to be made thereof; and such petitions and memorials shall be entered on the Journal, subject to the control and direction of the Speaker; and if any petition or memorial be so handed in, which, in the judgment of the Speaker, is excluded by the rules, the same shall be returned to the member from whom it was received.

That rule was adopted in 1842; and in the Manual there is a note appended to it as follows:

So much of the rules as authorized the presentation of petitions in the House was stricken out December 12, 1853. According to the practice under this rule a member may now take from the files petitions and memorials presented at a former Congress and re-refer them.

And of course he may present the petition in the ordinary form. Now the right of the citizen to petition is unquestioned, and his petition must be referred to the appropriate committee. I cannot conceive what would more properly constitute an occasion for the action of a committee by the presentation of a report and bill than a petition from those of whom we are the representatives and whose sentiments we should always attempt to carry out.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to say a few words upon the point of order. I know this bill has been introduced in an unusual way; but it is a right way. If I was compelled to take this devious method of introducing it no person perhaps in the House is more responsible than the gentleman from Michigan himself; because he, I think, last Monday, the day when bills are ordinarily introduced according to the custom and allowed to be printed—he I think chiefly obstructed——

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman does he mean to charge me with any obstruction to business that is not within the legitimate province of any member of this House?

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not.

Mr. CONGER. Then I would advise the gentleman to use his terms more carefully.

Mr. STEPHENS. In what way?

Mr. CONGER. I venerate the gentleman from Georgia, but he must remember he must not speak of my obstructing as if I violated some rule of this House.

Mr. STEPHENS. I did not mean to say the gentleman violated any rule.

Mr. CONGER. Even the great respect I have for the gentleman from Georgia will not permit me to sit quiet when he charges me in that way.

Mr. STEPHENS. I did not mean to say the gentleman violated any rule. He did, however, obstruct the offering of bills last Monday. He acted under and according to the rules; but by his action he did obstruct. And while he was obstructing one door——

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Chair if that is a proper expression to use about the action of a member of this House who acts strictly within the rules of the House, or whether it is not objectionable and, if I may be allowed the expression, unparliamentary?

The SPEAKER. The Chair must take the word of the gentleman from Georgia that he meant no reflection whatever.

Mr. STEPHENS. None at all.

The SPEAKER. Of course anything that is not meant to reflect is not unparliamentary.

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not mean to reflect upon any gentleman here even by saying they filibuster. That has got to be a parliamentary word here.

The SPEAKER. And it is very expressive.

Mr. STEPHENS. Very. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say that while the gentleman from Michigan was obstructing, and did obstruct, (I mean no reflection whatever upon him,) the introduction of bills in the ordinary way, I sought under another rule a way of getting them in otherwise legitimately and properly. Now, sir, I should greatly have preferred to introduce this bill last Monday, and all the members of this House, with perhaps five hundred bills to introduce, would greatly have preferred to offer them in the regular way and have them printed and referred that the people of the country everywhere might see them. But we could not do it. And why not? The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] knows perhaps as well as any other member of this House.

Now, sir, I do not wish to take up the time of the House in discussing the point of order. I call the previous question upon it. I hold that the bill comes in here legitimately and properly, and I want the action of the House upon it. I therefore now ask the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I think the gentleman cannot call the previous question on a point of order.

The SPEAKER. Why?

Mr. CONGER. The Chair must decide it; not the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is right, but the Chair prefers the House to exercise the power to control the debate in this instance.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair can stop remarks upon the point of order at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not wish to stop debate; the Chair is willing to listen, but the gentleman from Georgia the Chair thought for the moment had the right to demand the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. On the point of order? There is no vote on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. That is true, unless there is an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. I submit to the Chair that if the Chair needs any protection he had better be under the protection of this side of the House from the gentleman of Georgia, who leads him into mistakes.

I am informed by the gentleman whose name is attached to the petition, that he introduced the petition in the last Congress and, so far as he recollects, not in this Congress. I have thought that perhaps it was bad enough to have these things come in by a back window in this Congress, but if it has come in not only in an irregular way, but has not got into this Congress at all, why the gentleman from Georgia is driven to greater straits than I had possibly intended by the objection I had made or by my "obstruction."

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman proceeds upon the statement he has just made, the Chair desires to inquire whether this petition was withdrawn from the files of the last House and re-referred?

Mr. STEPHENS. It was re-referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and presented by me legitimately under Rule 131.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the indorsement upon the back of the petition.

The Clerk read as follows:

The petition of the New York Gas-Light Company, Samuel Carter, and a great many other citizens, asking the passage of a bill by Congress for the interchange of subsidiary silver coins and United States notes.

Referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, April 14, 1879, by Mr. STEPHENS.

Mr. CONGER. I was told, and I find that the fact is confirmed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] who presented the petition, that it has not been presented to this Congress.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to know whether it is competent now for the House to act on the question whether the committee has proper jurisdiction, under the rules, of this bill.

The SPEAKER. That is the second point which the Chair thinks the gentleman from Michigan makes.

Mr. BUCKNER. I did not so understand it.

Mr. CONGER. In my opinion, if this petition has been withdrawn from the files of the House by a member it could not come again before the House through the petition-box. It must be withdrawn from the files of the House by a vote of the House and committed to a committee in this Congress. I need not dwell on that point. Every member here knows that is the only way in which it could be done. There seems to be irregularity all through, in the eagerness to get this bill before the committee.

Now, I admit that it is necessary, if you will violate the rules of the House and the spirit of those rules there is necessity for considerable amount of irregularity; therefore I do not find so much fault with it on account of the necessity.

But to the main point: the decision of the Chair upon this question, whichever way it may be determined, may establish a new method of proceeding which may dispense entirely with the morning hour on Monday, may dispense entirely with the ordinary mode of introducing bills, and may dispense entirely with that supervision and oversight which has from the beginning of the Government until this time always been exercised over the business of the House and the direction in which it shall be sent. It may give, by the will of any one member, the control of the subject-matter to any committee within his choice, and avoid all questions of reference and all the right to amend the question of reference.

I allude to this matter not because I care what is the result in this case; I allude to it seriously because in my opinion the decision of the Chair upon this question, if in favor of this mode of introducing bills, will be a very serious and alarming innovation upon all the past customs and rules of proceedings in Congress.

Now, one word in regard to the obstruction of which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] speaks. If a member of this House raises a point of order and the Chair sustains him in it or the House sustains him in it, the Chair is then an "obstructionist," in the language of the gentleman from Georgia, or the House is an obstructionist. I have never heard it claimed before that any member might not raise a point of order; I have never heard before that any member might not move to amend a question of reference. If the result of that produce dilatoriness it is simply a consequence.

I call obstruction such motions as are ordinarily resorted to in cases of filibustering, motions made purely for delay, like the motion to adjourn when nobody desires to adjourn, or the refusing to vote when the roll is called, in order to leave the House without a quorum; any one of the ten, fifteen, or twenty ways which your honor, Mr. Speaker, instructed us in so thoroughly when we were in the majority in this House and the other side were in the minority.

But what one member does or another member does is of very slight consequence compared with such a decision by the Chair as shall keep the control of the business of this House within the reach of the Speaker or within the reach of the House, so that the House may determine to what committee a particular subject-matter may be referred.

The Chair will see that if any petition accompanied by a bill may be sent to any committee, and they in that way shall obtain jurisdiction of the subject-matter of that bill, then the rules of this House are of no avail whatever, for a member through the petition-box will have given jurisdiction to any one committee of any subject whatever.

I have said enough to call the attention of the Chair to the importance and seriousness of this question. Having no personal interest in the result any more than the Speaker or any other member of the House has, I leave it for the Chair to decide.

Mr. STEPHENS. One word, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has referred to this petition as having been presented at the last Congress. It was so presented, as the indorsement upon it shows, by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.] I took it from the file, under the note to Rule 131, and represented it, as has been shown. I ask the Clerk to read the note to that rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

So much of the rules as authorized the presentation of petitions in the House was stricken out December 12, 1853. According to the practice under this rule it is competent for a member to withdraw from the files petitions and memorials presented at a former Congress and re-refer them.

Mr. STEPHENS. I now call for the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the Clerk to read in connection with this point of order the ruling of Mr. Barclay, as quoted on page 165 of the Digest, beginning with the paragraph on top of the page.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bills on leave, when and how introduced; what bills not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider. The notice above referred to is rarely given in the House, (it being in order to give it there only when resolutions are in order,) but is usually given to the Clerk, by sending to him a written memorandum in this form: "Mr.—— gives notice that to-morrow, or on some subsequent day, he will ask leave to introduce a bill, (here insert its title.)" If the member desires his notice to appear in the newspaper report of the proceedings of the House, he should furnish the reporter of such paper with a copy of the memorandum furnished the Clerk. Having given his notice, it is then in order, on any subsequent day, when bills on leave and resolutions are being called for, and when his particular State is called, to move for leave to introduce his bill. The practice of introducing bills on leave, it may be remarked, however, does not facilitate business. If, instead of waiting for an opportunity to introduce his bill on leave, the member would file his petition, or whatever other matter he may have in favor of the proposed legislation, and have it referred to the appropriate committee, as he may do on any day, under Rule 131, (see Petitions,) he will thus have the subject before them, and will get a bill reported as speedily as if it had been originally referred. Besides, the bill thus reported comes before the House unencumbered with amendments, as is not likely to be the case with a bill previously referred. These suggestions, of course, do not apply to cases where the immediate passage of a bill, without the intervention of a committee, is sought for, or where it is desirable to refer it to a select committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. This is the ruling by Mr. Barclay, the former Journal Clerk of the House. It seems to me it meets in every respect the point of order raised by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

The SPEAKER. The point of order presented by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] as the Chair understands it, is as to the right of a committee to report a bill based on a petition placed in the petition-box of the House, in the manner as was done on Monday last. Whether or not the petition in this case went rightfully to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures the Chair is not at this time sufficiently advised to determine. But on the question whether a committee has the right to report legislation based upon petitions presented and referred to them the Chair is willing to make decision.

Rule 131 makes provision as to the manner in which petitions shall be presented by a member. Rule 148 speaks of "communications." Now communications are oftentimes transmitted to the House by heads of Departments; but the Chair is of opinion that the word "communications," as used in Rule 148, includes and covers petitions from citizens. Petitions constitute the mode by which the citizen may communicate with the House.

The next question involved is, whether upon such a petition, rightfully presented and appropriately referred, a committee has the right to base legislation? The Chair is of opinion that any committee of the House has that right under those circumstances, for reasons which will be evident by reference to the past history of this House. The subject of the tariff has been considered in the Committee of Ways and Means, not always by the reference of a bill to the committee, but as in the last Congress, when more than six thousand petitions were presented by citizens of the United States on the subject of a revision of the tariff. The Committee of Ways and Means in that Congress, without question, submitted a report based upon the petitions of citizens in the manner stated.

Much of the legislation of this House upon private bills has been based upon communications of citizens, the petitions of claimants, upon which the committees have reported bills to this House. In addition to that, communications are constantly presented to this House from heads of Departments and bureaus, oftentimes accompanied by bills, as in this instance. And the committees to which those communications have been referred have always been considered as having the right to report such accompanying bills back to the House, although those bills had not been presented by a member in his place on the floor, but through the medium of communications from the heads of Departments.

The Chair therefore is of opinion that a committee has the right to report a bill when the petition of a citizen has been referred to that committee, whether the petition is accompanied by a bill or not. If a bill accompanies the petition the committee can report that bill back to the House, and if the petition alone is referred to the committee, then the committee can bring in a bill based upon the subject-matter of the petition.

Mr. STEPHENS. I am entitled to the floor, I believe, on the report of the committee.

Mr. CONGER. Has the bill been read?

The SPEAKER. It has been.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the second reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] desires to make a further point of order, not embraced, as the Chair supposed some time ago, in the questions raised by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. BUCKNER. The point to which I desire to call the attention of the Chair is whether any member of the House can, without the action of the House or the assent of the Chair, send to any committee he may designate any subject-matter that may be embraced in a petition.

The SPEAKER. Rule 131 provides in the first place the manner in which members shall present petitions; and it then instructs the Speaker, as it were, to review the reference of those petitions, and directs him, if in his opinion any petition has not been properly referred, to review the same. Now, on the afternoon of Monday last the Chair caused a careful examination to be made by the petition clerk, and subsequently he made an examination himself, to ascertain whether the petitions presented by being deposited in the box at the Clerk's desk were properly referred; and he found that those that had gone into the petition-box were properly referred. The petition in this case the Chair had not the opportunity to examine, because it seems to have been re-referred, thus escaping the attention of the Chair.

As to the question whether this petition should have been properly referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures or to the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Chair thinks that is a matter of which the House should have taken control if the opportunity had been permitted.

Mr. BUCKNER. The question I desire to put to the Chair is whether this bill is in such a form that the House can now act on that question by a proper motion; in other words, the gentleman from Georgia having introduced this bill, whether it is now proper to make a motion that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which committee in my opinion it properly belongs.

The SPEAKER. That motion will be in order if the gentleman from Georgia yields for the purpose at proper time.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks on examination of the bill, that a part of it clearly belongs to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures—that part relating to subsidiary coins. There may be a question, however, whether that part of the bill which relates to the substitution of legal-tenders should not properly go to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. BUCKNER. I draw this distinction, which it seems to me is very apparent under the rule defining the powers of these two committees: that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has unquestionably exclusive control over all matters of coinage in the proper sense of that term; where, for instance, the mere device, or form, or weight of the coin is concerned; but when you come to the question of currency, when the question is as to the extent to which coin shall be current, what shall be the laws regulating its exchangeability, or what shall be its functions, then to my mind it is perfectly clear that such questions belong to the Committee on Banking and Currency; for when anything becomes currency in the general acceptation of the term, whether it be made of paper, gold, or silver, or other metal, the question then does not relate to the matter of coinage at all, but is one of currency purely. When the function of mere coinage is ended, when the money coined becomes curreney, when the question is as to its functions, as to what shall be done with it, as to what laws shall govern it, it is clear under the rules defining the duties of these two committees that all such questions belong to the Committee on Banking and Currency. The language of the rule is:

It shall be the duty of the Committee on Banking and Currency to take into consideration all propositions relative to banking and the currency.

Not what is, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, currency—bank-notes and legal-tenders—but whatever is in fact currency, including subsidiary coin, the standard silver dollar, the gold dollar, or the eagle. In other words, this committee has jurisdiction, not only of the subject of banking, but of the entire question of the currency.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take occasion to remark in connection with his statement of a few moments ago that State Legislatures have a constant habit of asking by joint resolution (which is the ordinary mode of communication between State Legislatures and Congress) for the construction of public buildings, light-houses, improvements of rivers and harbors, &c.; and the committees of this House having charge, respectively, of those subjects have uniformly introduced legislation based upon such communications from State Legislatures.

Mr. CONGER. In that connection let me say that almost all those subjects are at an ordinary session embraced in the President's message; and by the distribution of the subjects of that message among the various committees of the House, the erection of light-houses, the improvements of rivers and harbors, &c., are appropriately referred.

The SPEAKER. But if they receive the proper reference it does not matter whether they reach the committee under one rule of the House or another.

Mr. PRICE. I want to say a word in this connection in addition to what the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. BUCKNER] has said. The Chair and the House will see the difficulty we are running into here. I understand that in the shape in which this matter now is we cannot even raise the question of reference. Here is a bill reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, though it has neither coinage nor weights nor measures in it. [Laughter.] It is a bill relating entirely to the question of currency. Subsidiary coin is one form of currency, and that is by this bill made interchangeable with paper currency. But although this bill is entirely connected with the question of the currency and should properly have been considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency, we cannot now raise the question of reference at all. This difficulty will stare us in the face until our rules upon this point are changed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees with the gentleman, that the matter of which he complains is an evil. The House ought to have control of the reference of any matter in the first instance; but the rule under which this petition has been presented does not make such provision nor give such opportunity, which it ought to do, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. PRICE. The fact that they do not is a great evil to which I am trying to direct the attention of the Chair and the House, so that it may be corrected. The House ought certainly to have control of the reference of its business. If this matter had been presented in the usual way as a bill, according to the custom of the House for the last fifteen years within my certain knowledge, then the House would have had an opportunity to say to what committee the bill should be referred. If there is any business belonging properly to the Committee on Banking and Currency, this is such business. But now we cannot raise that question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa will observe that the Chair distinctly ruled only on the abstract right of the committees of this House to originate legislation based on the reference of petitions. In this instance the Chair thinks it right, with a view to a full and fair understanding of the whole case, to state in addition that opportunity was not given to the House as to the reference of the petition upon which this bill is introduced, and therefore, to avoid controversy, he would suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that instead of taking advantage of the demand for the previous question, he allow the question to be submitted to the House for the House itself to determine whether this petition has been rightfully referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures or not. That really will not obstruct any report from one or the other committee.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have not the slightest objection to the gentleman making that motion at the proper time. I am to be heard, however, first on the bill after the point of order has been settled.

The SPEAKER. This question the House can determine in its own clear judgment.

Mr. STEPHENS. At the right time.

The SPEAKER. By the gentleman from Georgia permitting the gentleman from Missouri to make the motion for reference to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and then those who believe this petition has been rightfully referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures will of course vote against any such commitment of the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. STEPHENS. But I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. Those who think the bill should go to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and that it properly belongs there, will of course vote in the affirmative. In either event the bill is likely to have a hearing in the House. It avoids at the same time the charge which might be made as to the manner of the reference of the petition upon which this legislation is based.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have the floor, and it was only taken from me on the point of order.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish first to speak on the point of order myself.

Mr. KELLEY. But I wish to make a suggestion which may be of importance to the gentleman.

Mr. STEPHENS. Very well, I will hear it.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, first, that if events have put us back under the old rules of the House, and thus prevented the House from controlling the committee to which bills should go, it is due to those gentlemen who, availing themselves of their knowledge of the rules of the House, defeated the presentation of bills on Monday morning last by parliamentary tactics. Prior to the adoption of the rule, which was practically set aside by those tactics on Monday, all bills arose on petition or on bills presented by a member after notice that he would present the bill on a certain day and ask for its reference to a committee. Then the House decided to which committee it should go for consideration.

But the bill on which we proposed to act last Monday came in under a rule adopted after standing committees were first organized. Under that rule the member introducing a bill could move its reference, and any other member could propose any other destination. From the day of the adoption of that rule, and I think it was about forty years ago, the point made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] on last Monday never seems to have occurred to any member of this House, and when on Monday he defeated the action of that rule he forced gentlemen to resort to the ancient usage and deprived the House and the people of all knowledge of the purport of bills, even of their titles, and the House of control of the committees to which they are to be committed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe this petition was presented at the last Congress by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] and he seems to have thought at that time that the bill which was embraced and recommended to be passed by the petitioners was properly referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. Naturally, the gentleman from Georgia made the same reference in this Congress. But the Chair nevertheless did not have an opportunity, as provided for in Rule 131, to see whether this was rightfully referred or not.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make this point: that this bill has not been read a second time, and must be read now a second time before a motion to commit can be made in reference to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair only suggested in proper time that as a mode to test the sense of the House as to its reference.

Mr. SPRINGER. The House can settle the question of reference when the time for commitment arises. This bill has been referred already to a committee. That committee has reported to the House, and the question first is, after the bill is read, shall it be read a second time? It cannot be read a second time on the day of presentation, under Rule 115, unless there is a special order to that effect. But the House may do that immediately.

But under Rule 117—

The first reading of a bill shall be for information, and, if opposition be made to it, the question will be, "Shall this bill be rejected?" If no opposition be made, or if the question to reject be negatived, the bill shall go to its second reading without a question.

Rule 118 says:

Upon the second reading of a bill, the Speaker shall state it as ready for commitment or engrossment.

And the motion to commit cannot be entertained till the bill be read a second time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause one of his own rulings to be read on that point.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Field, from the select committee on the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the vote for President and Vice-President of the United States, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4693) to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States in respect to vacancies in the office of President and Vice-President, and demanded the previous question thereon.

Mr. Horatio C. Burchard made the point of order that the committee had no authority to report the said bill.

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order on the ground that the resolution creating the said committee authorized it "to ascertain and report what are the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States," and also gave the committee the right to report at any time.

The SPEAKER further stated that he could not conceive of a question of higher constitutional and parliamentary privilege than was involved in the bill under consideration, and he therefore held the bill to be in order at this time.

Mr. James Wilson made the point of order that a bill cannot be read twice on the same day without special order of the House, and the bill in question had not been made a special order by the House.

Mr. Horatio C. Burchard made the point of order that the bill had only been read for information, and he now objected to the reception of the bill.

The SPEAKER held that the bill had received its first reading, and that the question now, under Rule 117, was, Shall the bill be rejected?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I desire to say that in presenting that petition on the 17th of February, I asked its reference to the Committee on Banking and Currency. It was at that time referred, as I supposed, to a committee that had no more to do with it than the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It was so referred by the vote of the House. I wish simply that this may be fully understood. The petition carries the names of a very large number of business men of New York asking a simple act of justice that they may be saved from untold inconvenience and anxiety. There is no member of this House who would oppose it.

Mr. HOOKER. I wish to say a single word in reference to the decision the Speaker has made on the point of order. In reference to the power of the standing committees of this House to report bills, I think that Rule 115 settles the question emphatically. It provides as follows:

Every bill shall be introduced on the report of a committee or by motion on leave.

The Speaker will observe the disjunctive conjunction is used here, and the rule states two methods of presenting bills. Originally, before standing committees were adopted in this House all bills were introduced on leave on notice given, and they were referred to committees. But after the creation of the standing committees, they were no longer thus introduced; and it is stated by the commentator on this subject that thirty years elapsed during which no bill was introduced by leave, and all bills came from committees.

Every bill shall be introduced on the report of a committee or by motion for leave.

In the note to this rule is the following:

In the early stages of the Government, before the institution of standing committees, it was the common practice to introduce bills, on motion for leave, by individual members; the bills were then referred to a select committee, to examine and report upon. The practice, however, of introducing bills by members on leave, gradually grew into disuse as standing committees were created, and for nearly thirty years no case occurs on the Journals. Within a few years past the practice has been revived, and has now become very common, but it is, nevertheless, a very inconvenient one, and does not facilitate business. Previous to the 13th March, 1822, so strict was the House upon the introduction of bills that standing committees had to obtain leave in every case to report by bill. On that day the seventy-first rule was adopted.

The seventy-first rule is in these words:

The several standing committees of the House shall have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The SPEAKER. The point is settled that the committees have the right upon petitions referred to them to frame bills. And then by Rule 71, as stated by the gentleman from Mississippi, the right is given to report.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question; whether those rules do not sustain every point I made in my brief speech?

Mr. HOOKER. I think they do.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. STEPHENS. Before the gentleman from Tennessee makes his motion I wish to ask will this question come up to-morrow morning as we leave it now?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill; and pending that I move that the debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that motion comes over from last evening. The Chair will cause the entry in the Journal to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ATKINS moved that when the House next resumes the consideration of the said bill in the said committee all debate shall cease on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto in ten minutes.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish the motion to include all amendments that may be offered hereafter to the pending paragraph.

The SPEAKER. The House can cut off all debate but not amendments.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not propose to cut off amendments but to cut off debate upon them.

The motion to close debate was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to yield that I may introduce a resolution in relation to documents and books. I have objected hitherto to the introduction of a resolution on that subject. I think this will not occupy a minute.

Mr. ATKINS. I object. The gentleman had better take that up in the morning hour.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out from line 2065 to line 2085, both inclusive, (the three paragraphs relating to the southern claims commission,) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That any person who may have a claim against the United States of which the Court of Claims would not now have jurisdiction, but founded upon equity and justice, and not barred by any statute of limitations provided by any law of the United States, may file his bill in the Court of Claims of the United States, setting out the grounds of his claims and the relief desired by him; and the Attorney-General of the United States shall appear and plead thereto as provided for in other cases.

Any issue of fact joined upon such bill may be tried by the court as now provided for cases of which it has jurisdiction.

The court shall find the facts appearing from the testimony before them in each case, and shall report their findings to Congress, with their opinion as to the determination that should be made of such claim.

Congress shall not consider nor allow nor authorize the payment of any private claim not payable under existing laws until the same has been heard and reported to Congress by said Court of Claims, as herein provided.

All claims against the United States provided for by this act not prosecuted within six years from the passage of this section, or of the time when the same severally accrued, shall be barred, except that when the claimants are under legal disability to sue, the action must be brought within said six years, or within three years after such disability shall cease.

All acts and parts of acts establishing the southern claims commission, and all acts amendatory thereof, are hereby repealed. And all records, books, and papers of said commission, and cases pending therein, shall be transferred to the Court of Claims, to be disposed of by that court as other cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] moves to strike out in the first paragraph the words "and not barred by any statute of limitations provided by any law of the United States."

Mr. ATKINS. I move a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] so as to amend the paragraphs proposed to be stricken out by adding thereto what I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of line 2085 the following:

That any person who may have a claim against the United States of which the Court of Claims would not now have jurisdiction, but founded upon equity and justice, and not barred by any statute of limitations provided by any law of the United States, may file his bill in the Court of Claims of the United States, setting out the grounds of his claim and the relief desired by him; and the Attorney-General of the United States shall appear and plead thereto as provided for in other cases.

Any issue of fact joined upon such bill may be tried by the court as now provided for cases of which it has jurisdiction.

The court shall find the facts appearing from the testimony before them in each case, and shall report their findings to Congress, with their opinion as to the determination that should be made of such claim.

Congress shall not consider nor allow nor authorize the payment of any private claim not payable under existing laws until the same has been heard and reported to Congress by said Court of Claims, as herein provided.

All claims against the United States provided for herein not prosecuted within six years from the passage of this act, or of the time when the same severally accrued, shall be barred, except that when the claimants are under legal disability to sue, the action must be brought within said six years, or within three years after such disability shall cease.

Mr. ATKINS. I will explain in a moment the nature of that substitute.

Mr. KEIFER. I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. My amendment provides that the southern claims commission shall continue until the 10th day of March, 1880, the time to which the appropriation is made for in this bill. It then proposes to transfer to the Court of Claims all the records and papers in cases not decided upon and not reported to Congress and which are not barred by any existing statute over to the Court of Claims. It then goes further, sufficiently to embrace what is usually denominated the Potter amendment. That is the substance of the substitute I have offered.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is due that I should state that if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois is to pass at all, I prefer that it should pass in the form of the substitute I have offered. I did not think this was the time or the place to put such an amendment upon an appropriation bill, but I offer my substitute because if anything is to be done in this direction I prefer that it should be done in this shape.

Mr. WHITE. I make the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee changes existing law and is not in the interest of retrenchment and reform. While I am upon the floor I desire to say one word of explanation. Yesterday the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] offered an amendment, which is pending, and stated that certain gentlemen on this side of the House had voted for that proposition when it was submitted by a former member from New York, Mr. Potter. I have not looked at the record.

I voted for that proposition, and under similar circumstances I would vote for it again; so that there can be no misunderstanding about it. That proposition did not comprehend this class of claims at all. My recollection is that some gentleman upon the floor arose and interrogated the gentleman from New York upon that subject, but it was not necessary to have any interpretation put upon it, because it will be observed that the claims that are to be considered under the provisions of that law are limited to six years, and all those claims arising out of the war have existed longer than six years. Furthermore, the only claims to be considered were those that were valid under existing laws.

Now, it is very well known that under the act of 1864 and under the act of 1867 no claim in any of the States that were in insurrection for subsistence or other supplies would be valid claims. They were positively prohibited; so that the purpose of the legislation of last year which we voted for was to relieve this Congress from the insufferable nuisance of being called upon from time to time to pass these claims.

The object was to provide additional legislation and give Congress concurrent action with the Court of Claims. I do not think that this amendment is obnoxious and liable to the criticism that it would allow what are known as war claims to be presented.

Mr. SPRINGER. As but ten minutes is allowed by the House for debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments, I suggest that the point of order which has been made should be decided.

Mr. WHITE. A word further. I am opposed to this proposition because it is against the policy which this House established yesterday.

Mr. KEIFER. One moment on the point of order. I understand the effect of this amendment to be to revive a large number of claims now barred by statute,

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that I do not think my substitute as read will justify such a declaration.

Mr. KEIFER. I admit that there is some difficulty in understanding the whole of the amendment from the reading. The first part of the substitute refers to the Court of Claims the cases which may be pending and undetermined before the southern claims commission on the 10th of March, 1880. Then in the latter part of the substitute there is a provision authorizing for the first time a certain class of claims to be presented to the Court of Claims which now are not authorized to go either before the southern claims commission or before any court. It creates a large number of claims for the first time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman made a point of order and should address himself to that.

Mr. KEIFER. My point of order is that the proposed substitute changes existing law and will not retrench expenditures. If I can show that a large number of claims are created by the substitute, certainly it will not retrench expenditures. As to whether it changes existing law or not, I suppose there can be no doubt. There is now no law authorizing this class of claims, after the southern claims commission is through under the existing law, to be presented to the Court of Claims. The claims not disposed of by the southern claims commission are not now provided for being considered in any other court. Five thousand of them or thereabout will be barred, and the remainder of them we expect will be disposed of.

I will say now what I did not say yesterday, that I understand from a prominent member of the southern claims commission that they now are so far along with their work that they will be able to dispose of all the claims submitted to them on their merits. I think the substitute as offered changes existing law, and certainly cannot retrench expenditures.

Mr. SPRINGER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] abolishes the southern claims commission after March 10, 1880; after which time that commission can be no further charge upon the Government.

It also includes the greater part of my amendment in the very words. The only new matter in it is that to which I have referred. Therefore the point of order must go to the extent that this new matter goes; for the proposition now pending and which I offered has already been decided to be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no difficulty in ruling upon the point of order. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] certainly does change existing law. But it is equally apparent that it looks to the retrenchment of expenditures by the amount of twenty-odd thousand dollars required annually for the support of this commission. What additional expenditures may be imposed upon the Treasury does not appear upon the face of the amendment. The Chair holds that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. SPRINGER. I accept the substitute of the gentleman from Tennessee. [Mr. ATKINS.]

Mr. WHITE. I make the point of order that the gentleman cannot accept the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Until the House has acted upon my amendment I have the right to modify it.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. YOUNG.]

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. YOUNG; and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. ATKINS to the amendment offered by Mr. SPRINGER.

Mr. SPRINGER. I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will be permitted to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

There was no objection.

The question was upon the amendment as modified.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House debate upon the pending paragraphs and amendments thereto is limited to ten minutes.

Mr. DUNNELL. Has not ten minutes been already occupied in debate?

The CHAIRMAN. That was upon the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. When the House adjourned last evening the question had been raised by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] as to whether the text of the amendment which I offered, with the exception of the repealing clause, was the text of what is known as the Potter bill, which was passed by the House at the last session of Congress. In order to satisfy my mind upon that point I have obtained a copy of the RECORD and have caused a careful examination and comparison to be made of the text of the two propositions. I find that I am sustained entirely in the statement which I made that the Potter bill and my amendment are the same in words and even in punctuation.

Mr. HUMPHREY. There is one change. The Potter bill did not repeal the laws establishing the southern claims commission.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have stated that it differs in that respect. Now one word in regard to the vote given by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HUMPHREY.] I find upon an examination of the Journal of the proceedings upon the passage of the Potter bill, that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HUMPHREY] is recorded as having voted in the affirmative.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The gentleman will allow me a single word. I understand that according to the Journal I voted against the Potter bill, as it is called, and afterward changed my vote. I want to say right here that I voted against the bill and did not change my vote. There is a mistake somewhere. My colleague [Mr. POUND] stood beside me when I voted against the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to state further that I have inquired of the tally-clerk of the House as to what was the record made at that time. The roll-call shows that the gentleman from Wisconsin first voted in the negative and afterward changed his vote to the affirmative.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is a mistake.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman is recorded in the affirmative in the Journal and in the RECORD.

Now, a word as to the merits of this proposition. I hope the House will adopt it. We hear much, and have heard much, on the other side of the House with regard to the payment of war claims. Just previous to the last presidential election the whole country was flooded with speeches, and every school-house rang with the harangues on the subject of southern war claims; and, as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] suggests, hand-bills were issued with the view of exciting the people on this subject. The effort was made to alarm the public mind of this country and to make the people of the North believe that if a democratic majority should be returned to this House and a democratic President elected, we would bankrupt the country by the payment of rebel claims.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe it is the desire of some persons in this country, perhaps of some gentlemen on the other side of the House, to keep this question still before the country as a live issue upon which they can go before the people at the next presidential election and endeavor to excite them on the subject of war claims. Now, the fact is that this House has voted but little money in that direction since the democratic party has been in the majority. I do not remember that a single bill for the payment of a war claim passed this House during the Forty-fifth Congress. There is no member upon this side of the House who has ever favored the payment of one dollar of money to a claimant who was not loyal during the late war; no proposition is now or has been made to pay any such claims. I hope the committee will adopt this provision as a part of the pending bill, so that hereafter no claim of any kind or character whatever can be paid by Congress until it has first had the scrutiny of a court, every member of which belongs to the republican party. The public mind can then rest in the belief that these claims are barred unless supported by judicial action.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, we have presented here under a restriction as to debate one of the most remarkable and startling propositions which has come before Congress since I have had any knowledge of its proceedings. The proposition is to repeal all the provisions of law relating to the southern claims commission and to substitute for those provisions a law allowing any person, loyal or disloyal, who may have a claim against the United States founded upon equity and justice, and not barred by any statutes of limitations, to go into the Court of Claims with his claim and have it adjudicated.

It is proposed to say to all persons, whether they were loyal or disloyal during the war, that if they have any claims that they think are founded on "equity and justice," they may go into the Court of Claims and prove them and have them adjudicated and paid out of the United States Treasury. To do this may cost this Government over $100,000,000, perhaps $500,000,000. The law that it is sought to have repealed merely allows the commissioners of claims to consider claims for supplies, quartermaster and commissary stores furnished for the use of the Army, and presented by persons who are shown to have been loyal throughout the war. The proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is to allow all sorts of claimants, disloyal parties as well as loyal ones, to come into court with claims of all kinds, including damages caused by the war, not hitherto paid for to loyal or disloyal persons. If we do this, let us do it with our eyes wide open.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] stands up and delivers a lecture to this side of the House about war claims, while he is accepting from the hands of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] a proposition to open the Court of Claims for the first time in the history of the country to all disloyal claimants, so that they may have their claims examined and paid. I warn this House and the country of this covert attempt to provide for paying rebel claims.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman distrust the Court of Claims on this subject?

Mr. KEIFER. I cannot yield to the gentleman. I would not give any court the right to adjudicate claims of persons who were disloyal. I want no lecture from him on this subject. We on this side of the House propose to stand by the loyal claimants of this country; I mean those who were loyal throughout the entire war, whether they lived in the North or in the South. But the gentleman's proposition is to strike down the provision of law relating to the southern claims commission, and substitute a provision that lets in all persons, whether they were loyal or disloyal throughout the war.

Mr. SPRINGER. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that is not the fact, and the record does not show it.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not yield to the gentleman. The proposition shows clearly that what I state is true. A new class of claimants, as to whom there is no legislation putting a bar on their right to go into court, are to be recognized by law for the first time if we adopt the substitute offered by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and accepted by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HUMPHREY.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has one minute.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Chairman, I desire merely to state that my attention was drawn to this class of claims on account of my being in the last Congress a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, before which there were brought claims of a different character, but which directed my attention to cases of this kind. I am satisfied that the record of my vote as cited by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is an error, because I remember that my attention was drawn particularly to the bill introduced by Mr. Potter, and I recollect distinctly that I voted against it. There is an error somewhere. My attention had been drawn to this class of claims, and I remember having my mind directed to the fact that a bill of that kind was objectionable because it let in a large class of claims that had been barred by statute. I opposed that bill. In closing, I desire to say to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] who has brought this matter to my attention, (and I am glad he has done so,) that his amendments, if adopted, will open the floodgates and there will be no end to a class of claims that are now dead.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question recurred on Mr. ATKINS's amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 76.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Attorney-General:

For compensation of the Attorney-General, $8,000; solicitor-general, $7,000; three Assistant Attorneys-General, at $5,000 each; one Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department, $4,000; Solicitor of the Internal Revenue, $4,500; examiner of claims, $3,500; law clerk and examiner of titles, $2,700; chief clerk, $2,200; stenographic clerk, $1,800; one law clerk, $2,000; five clerks of class 4; additional for disbursing clerk, and clerk in charge of pardons, each $200; one clerk of class 2; two clerks of class 1; five copyists, at $900 each; one telegraph operator, $1,000; two assistant messengers; two laborers; and two watchmen; in all, $73,600.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I move to amend in lines 2095 and 2096 by striking out all after the word "dollars" in line 2095 down to and including the word "dollars" in line 2096, and inserting "two stenographic clerks, one at $1,800 and one at $1,200."

Mr. BLOUNT and Mr. WHITE rose to a point of order.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Allow me for one moment to explain this amendment before gentlemen insist on their point of order.

Mr. WHITE. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed from the reading of the bill that there is but one stenographic clerk provided for in the office of the Attorney-General. In a conversation I had with the head of that Department I was informed that the present stenographic clerk, whose salary has been cut down, had frequently to work through the hours of the night and oftentimes on the Sabbath day. Questions are referred from all the Departments to the Attorney-General for his legal opinion, and he dictates his opinions, and they are taken down in short-hand and then written out in long-hand by the stenographic clerk. It is impossible for anybody else to do it. This involves an amount of labor upon the stenographic clerk almost intolerable, compelling him, as I have already stated, to work during the hours which ought to be given to sleep, and frequently requiring him, in order to keep his work up, to violate the Sabbath. My amendment provides for two stenographic clerks, one at $1,800 and another at $1,200. At present there is but one stenographic clerk in the whole Department.

These facts, as I have stated them, I have gathered from the Attorney-General himself. At the last session this question was referred to Mr. Durham, of Kentucky, who was known to be more economical even than myself, and he then offered this same amendment; but it was ruled out on the point of order. It is for this House to determine whether the present stenographic clerk shall be taxed with the whole work of this Department of the character I have referred to or we shall allow another stenographic clerk to be appointed at a salary of $1,200.

Mr. WHITE. I insist on my point of order. I do not find this in the estimates, and I submit it changes existing law and is not in the interest of retrenchment.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that it is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inquire whether there is any existing law authorizing the creation of this office?

Mr. WHITE. The existing law is the appropriation bill of last year, and that law only authorized the appointment of one stenographic clerk. This amendment changes that law.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I submit that it is not the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no difficulty in sustaining the point of order on the statement made.

Mr. HOUK. I move after the word "Department" in line 2090, page 85, to strike out "four" and insert "five," so it will read, "one Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department, $5,000."

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order on that amendment that it increases the appropriation and is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HOUK. I do not, except to appeal to the gentleman from Tennessee not to press his point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. No, I cannot be appealed to on that point.

Mr. HOUK. I ask, then, that the letter of the Attorney-General be read.

Mr. ATKINS. That does not affect the point of order.

Mr. HOUK. I agree that the point of order is well taken if the gentleman insists on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the reading of the letter?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, I object to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CALDWELL. I move to strike out "three Assistant Attorneys-General, at $5,000 each; one Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department, $4,000;" and in lieu thereof to insert "four Assistant Attorneys-General, one of whom shall be for the Post-Office Department, at a salary of $4,500 each."

Mr. ATKINS. That amendment is not liable to the point of order in my judgment. It was offered at the last session of Congress to this bill, and Judge Durham, in his watchfulness, made the point of order on it, but the Chair overruled it.

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not care to discuss this amendment further than to say that it is proper, in my judgment, the salaries of these four Assistant Attorneys-General should be equalized. While the amendment I have offered reduces the expenditures of the Government $1,000, and therefore is not liable to the point of order, yet the real object and purpose I had in making it was to do justice to the Assistant Attorney-General who is assigned to duty in the Post-Office Department. I think the duties devolved on that gentleman are fully as great as those discharged by any Assistant Attorney-General of the Government, and that it is exceedingly unjust to him to pay him a salary of $4,000 while the other three receive a salary of $5,000 each. For that reason I have offered this amendment. I will state very frankly that I would have supported the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee increasing the salary of this officer to $5,000, but as it was ruled out on a point of order there was no chance to remedy the injustice done to this gentleman except by equalizing in the manner proposed by my amendment.

Mr. REED. What does the amendment propose?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report it.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. REED. I desire to make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state the point of order comes too late after the amendment has been discussed.

Mr. WHITE. I rose to make the point of order, but the gentleman from Kentucky was on the floor and I could not get the eye of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair heard no point of order made or reserved.

Mr. WHITE. I meant to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot be advised as to what the gentleman meant.

Mr. REED. I desire to discuss the amendment on the merits. As I understand the proposition which has been made it practically reduces the Assistant Attorneys-General to the same grade as to salary. Am I correct in that?

Mr. CALDWELL. Quite correct.

Mr. REED. And what is to be the salary for each, if the gentleman will kindly inform me?

Mr. CALDWELL. My amendment puts the salary at $4,500 to each; reducing the salary of three from $5,000 to $4,500, and increasing the salary of the Assistant Attorney-General assigned to duty in the Post-Office Department from $4,000 to $4,500.

Mr. REED. Now, I submit to the House the proposition is unjust. It is a proposition which has been attempted to be put through this House on several occasions, upon one occasion at least before this. The object is simply to increase the salary of the Assistant Attorney-General in the Post-Office Department, and under the rules of the House it can only be done by reducing the salary of the other assistants.

Now, the First Assistant Attorney-General does all the duties which the Attorney-General of the United States used to do before a Department of Justice was created. He argues all the cases, or nearly all of them, in the Supreme Court of the United States; and I venture to say the attorneys who argue the cases on the other side before the Supreme Court receive at least five times the income which the present First Assistant Attorney-General receives. Now, everybody who knows anything of the labors appertaining to that office knows that the present salary is not too much. But the Assistant Atttorney-General attached to the Post-Office Department does office work simply and does not argue matters before the Supreme Court.

I submit, therefore, to the House whether it is worth while in order to raise the salary of one man $500 to reduce the salary of another who certainly earns twice the sum he receives from the Government? I hope the House will not permit this to be done.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the last word.

I trust that this amendment will not be adopted in this way. The object of the gentleman from Kentucky, as he says, is to equalize as to salary the three other Assistant Attorneys-General with the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department. That is the purpose of it. The amendment has been made in this way, in order to get it in under the rules, to increase the salary of the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department. The plea for the amendment is that these salaries ought to be equalized. Now, sir, I undertake to say that there is no evidence before this House to show that the duties are equal in their character and in their importance. It is a very common argument here that because the Commissioner of Pensions gets such a salary the Commissioner of Agriculture gets a different one, and so on, running through the various heads of bureaus; it is all wrong, that there ought to be equalization, without the argument being based on any careful examination of the duties of these officers. The gentleman from Kentucky during the last Congress was on the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, and was brought in contact with this officer and was favorably impressed with him, and, perhaps, rightly so.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. I would if I had time, but I want to finish what I have to say.

Now, I say the questions which the law officer in the Post-Office Department has to do with are of a less intricate character and require a less degree of learning and ability than the questions which these other officers have to deal with. Furthermore, these salaries have been fixed; they are the growth of experience. The estimate put upon the value of the services of these officers does not spring from the extemporaneous statement that their duties are equivalent, but it is the growth of experience from year to year. It will be remembered by the chairman of the committee and by other gentlemen who have been for some time members of the House that this whole subject of examining into the relative importance of the services of the officers in all these Departments was considered for some months by the distinguished gentleman now the Speaker of the House of Representatives and by the Committee on Appropriations of that time. And the matter was discussed upon this identical bill before the committee for three months. The whole subject was carefully considered and these salaries were arranged in this way, and I do trust the House will not at this time attempt to derange it. If during the next session of Congress there is any complaint about the order of these salaries and the arrangements with these officers as to their salaries, then there will be time to take up the subject and there will be an opportunity for the gentleman to have a hearing before the Committee on Appropriations and to present his views, or perhaps from some committee with which he is connected to make suggestions. But I do not believe it is wise for us to disturb at this time the salaries of these officers in the way proposed.

Mr. CALDWELL. I am somewhat surprised at my friend from Georgia taking the position he does in reference to this matter, for in the Forty-fifth Congress he voted for the very amendment which is now before the House and which was adopted by the House on this bill.

Now, I have to say in reference to the Assistant Attorney-General assigned to duty in the Post-Office Department, that in my judgment, from an investigation I have made, there is more responsibility attaching to him and there are required as high a degree of ability and as much industry to discharge the duties of that office as are required by any Assistant Attorney-General assigned to duty in any Department of this Government. The present arrangement, in my judgment, is but a species of favoritism and discrimination against a deserving officer of this Government, and there is no reason and can be none for it. That gentleman is the legal adviser of a Department of this Government that has contracts between this Government and forty thousand people. He is the legal adviser of that Department in arranging all prosecutions for violations of the postal laws of the country, and I see no reason on the face of the earth why discrimination should be made against this gentleman in favor of others.

I have offered the amendment purely from a sense of justice and not because the gentleman is to be benefited by it.

When I was on the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department I had no earthly connection with this gentleman, but I have seen a letter which he addressed to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, which letter defines his duties, and I was willing to vote him a salary of $5,000; but as that cannot be done I want to see equal and exact justice prevail between these gentlemen; therefore I offered the amendment in the present shape.

Mr. BRAGG. I hope the amendment will not prevail. During the Forty-fifth Congress I served as chairman of the committee having charge of the expenditures in the Department of Justice, and I then became convinced that I was right in an idea that I had become possessed of previously, that this whole system of having so-called Assistant Attorneys-General scattered through all the Departments was wrong; that the Attorney-General's office is the responsible law office of the Government; that the Attorney-General was the head of that Department, and that every opinion which emanated from that Department should emanate from him and should pass to the people of this country with the indorsement of the Attorney-General of the United States; that the practice of allowing the heads of the Departments to appoint their friends to some office that ought to be held by nobody else except a competent law clerk representing the Attorney-General was all wrong; that the so-called Assistant Attorneys-General distributed through the Departments were no more than ordinary clerks of the Attorney-General, and that he was the head from which all the law opinion should issue; that the men assigned to that duty should look through the formalities of the contracts and report them to the Attorney-General for his judgment; that any question that might arise should be referred to the Attorney-General, by whom law cases are considered, proper briefs prepared, and who makes the arguments and tries the cases, who brings a vast amount of professional skill and experience to bear for the benefit of the Government, in insisting upon the enforcement of the law as it should be; that no distinction should be made in favor of this man or that man; that the salaries that are given to these men are not too large, but the salaries given to the men who occupy these positions, who simply formulate opinions, is altogether too much.

I trust if any change is made it will be made by increasing the pay of the real Attorney-General and decreasing the pay of those men who are simply clerks in that Department.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I only desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG.] The fact is that the Assistant Attorney-General assigned for duty in the Post-Office Department as the Assistant Attorney-General is a good lawyer, and if he is not he ought to be, because the questions he is called to pass upon require the best order of legal ability. It is necessary that there should be some officer to explain the law, the same in this Deparment as in other Departments. This is a Department that spends absolutely $35,000,000 a year, nearly $20,000,000 for contracts for carrying the mails, touching also the railway service, and it is necessary that constructions of laws should be made, and those constructions require a large order of legal ability. No gentleman will controvert this who is familiar with the matter.

I am not here to speak of the proposed amendment. I only wanted to call the attention of the House, by way of reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] to the fact that this office is more than that of a mere clerk.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I have here a letter which gives the duties which this Assistant Attorney-General is required to perform:

First. In the examination of all contracts made by the Department.
Second. The examination of all recommendations made by the Sixth Auditor for the remission of fines and penalties under section 409 of the Revised Statutes.
Third. The instructions of special agents in all matters of prosecutions for violation of postal laws.
Fourth. The examination and passing upon of all claims against the Department, including claims growing out of leases, contracts for carrying the mails, and for the manufacture of stamps, envelopes, &c., and for furnishing the Department with stationery, &c.
Fifth. In advising and assisting the Department of Justice in the defense of all suits against the Government growing out of transactions with the Post-Office Department.
Sixth. In furnishing such information and imparting such instructions as will enable the several marshals and district attorneys to properly execute the postal laws.
Seventh. In passing upon all questions of mail classifications herein, of determining what is and what is not mailable, and the amount of postage chargeable for mailable matter of the several classes.
Eighth. In advising the Postmaster-General and each of the Assistant Postmasters-General on all matters touching which his advice is asked.
Something of the extent of the duties devolved upon this officer can be inferred when it is stated that over one thousand questions are annually submitted for his consideration.

Now it seems to me that no discrimination should be made against the gentleman who has these duties to perform. Give him the same salary as the other Assistant Attorneys-General. The process of striking down the salaries of all for the benefit of one is not correct. Let us raise the salary of this officer so that it shall be equal with the others, or let it be as it is. The process by which you give an increase to one and take from another is wrong in principle. Either abide by the salary as it now is or give this Assistant Attorney-General the same salary as the others now receive.

Let it stand one way or the other. It seems to me he should receive the same compensation that the others receive, and that their compensation should not be reduced for the purpose of making it the same as his.

Mr. REED. I desire that the House may understand the situation of this matter. This is not a proposition to give to the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department an increase of $500 of salary; it is a proposition to diminish by $500 the pay of each of three other deserving officers. Now, I submit there is not the slightest necessity for that. While the rules of this House render it impossible for us to raise the salary of the Assistant Attorney-General attached to the Post-Office Department, the rules of the Senate present no such difficulty. If justice requires that the salary of this officer should be raised, it can be raised elsewhere. There is no need of diminishing the deserved salary of three other officers in order to equalize the salary of this one.

Nobody has said, no one will undertake to say for an instant, that the three officers who receive an annual salary of $5,000 each are receiving a single dollar too much for the labors they perform. I hope the House will meet this question as they have always met it whenever it has been fairly discussed.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CALDWELL] expresses surprise that I should oppose his amendment. He says that in the last House I voted for this identical proposition. I do not remember what I did in the last House. It does not matter what I did or what I did not; that does not affect the position I have taken here.

There has been nothing presented to this committee to show that the duties of these officers are identical as to the amount of labor or as to the dignity of the labor which they perform. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HUMPHREY] has read from the Revised Statutes the duties prescribed to this official, and as he read them they sounded very important. We know, however, that practically these officers are not graded with each other in their actual work.

The Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department does not give all the advice the head of that Department requires. Most of the information desired by the Department is to be found in the regulations of the Post-Office Department by the officers who may need it. It is said that sometimes this officer is called upon to give advice in regard to contracts. Now, as a matter of fact, the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States has been called for by the Post-Office Department whenever any very important question has been raised. A number of such instances has been brought to my attention. Gentlemen will find that wherever any very intricate legal questions are involved the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States is always sought by the Department.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I have drawn my inference from the statutes. I know as a matter of fact that when I go to the Interior Department, for instance, for the decision of a question, I am referred to the Assistant Attorney-General of that Department, who is the solicitor for that Department.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Wisconsin has stated very properly that the Assistant Attorneys-General are the real officers relied upon, and these others are merely in places which are made for particular persons. They are just a fungus growth upon the Department, and are not necessary. When any real question of importance is raised the Attorney-General is applied to for the information.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I did not say that I was sent to the Attorney-General, but to the Assistant Attorney-General for the Department, who is the solicitor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 55) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the purchase or construction of a refrigerating ship for the disinfection of vessels and cargoes, and for other purposes.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CALDWELL.]

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 59, noes 65.

Mr. CALDWELL. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CALDWELL and Mr. REED were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 64, noes 79.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For stationery, books, fuel, labor, postage, and other contingent and miscellaneous expenses, $2,000; for reporting the decisions of the court, clerical hire, labor in preparing and superintending the printing of the fourteenth volume of the reports of the Court of Claims, to be paid on the order of the court, $1,000; in all, $3,000.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$2,000" and inserting "$2,500;" also by striking out at the end of the paragraph "$3,000" and inserting "$3,500." That is to increase the contingent fund of the Court of Claims $500. They need it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. There are two or three amendments which I think ought to be offered to this bill, but in order to offer them it will be necessary to go back to the body of the bill. If there is no objection to doing so, I would like to offer two or three amendments.

Mr. WHITE. What are they?

Mr. ATKINS. The first is to make immediately available the amount appropriated for the folding-room of the House. Another is, on page 25 of the bill, to reduce the force in the office of the Treasurer. That is at his own suggestion. The object is to reduce the force in one place by fifteen clerks and to increase it in another by eight clerks; making a total reduction of seven clerks. Those are the two principal amendments. There is another amendment which I think should be offered, to increase the force in the Interior Department by two clerks, and also to give it a messenger. But I do not care particularly whether that amendment is offered or not.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the omission of a clerk in one of the Auditors' offices. That subject has been brought to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ATKINS. I shall make no objection to that amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I wish the Chair to understand that I am asking to go back for these precise amendments; I am not willing to go back for any others.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman includes my amendment to change five to six in line 515?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLS. In an amendment adopted on motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE,] in reference to the distribution of seeds, there was a phrase which should be corrected. It spoke of "a reasonable and equal proportion." There may be some difficulty about the construction; and the words "reasonable and" should be struck out.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations designate the amendments that he wants to adopt by going back?

Mr. ATKINS. I have done so.

Mr. SPARKS. I have no objection to any amendment which the gentleman from Tennessee may desire to submit; but I shall object to going back generally; and I shall reserve the right to oppose, when we do go back, any amendment which seems to me improper.

Mr. WHITE. I have another amendment to suggest. Upon very insufficient consideration, as I think, an amendment was adopted changing the pay of gaugers and storekeepers in the internal-revenue department.

Mr. ATKINS. That can be corrected when we get into the House. I agree with the gentleman (and so said at the time) that we did wrong in reducing the salaries of these storekeepers; but that amendment will necessarily come up in the House.

Mr. WHITE. Very well. I presume we can have the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. DIBRELL. I think I must object to any going back. There was objection made the other day when I proposed to do so.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well; then my colleague [Mr. DIBRELL] objects to a saving of $9,000 in the matter of clerks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to go back for the purpose of offering the amendments that he has indicated.

Mr. HAYES. Will these amendments give rise to any discussion? If not, I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in the power of the Chair to limit the discussion. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations? The Chair hears none.

Mr. McMILLAN. There was objection made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DIBRELL.]

Mr. DIBRELL. I did object; but if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations wants to correct anything, I have no objection to going back for that purpose.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to be perfectly fair. The purpose is not to correct anything, but to offer some amendments which I think ought to be offered for the good of the service. One amendment which I propose to offer will reduce expenditures $9,000.

Mr. DIBRELL. I am willing to go back for amendments reducing expenses, but not for amendments increasing them.

Mr. ATKINS. Will my colleague object to making immediately available the appropriation for the folding-room?

Mr. DIBRELL. I will not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has asked unanimous consent to go back in the consideration of this bill that he may offer certain amendments which he has indicated, and none others. The Chair hears no objection to that request; and the gentleman from Tennessee will now indicate his amendments.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "dollars" in line 269, the words "provided that the amount appropriated for the pay of four of said laborers shall be immediately available." The laborers here referred to are employés in the folding-room.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to offer an amendment to the second paragraph of the appropriations for the Treasurer's office. I move to amend by striking out "thirty-six," in line 599, and inserting "twenty-nine," so as to read, "twenty-nine clerks of class 1;" by striking out "twenty-six," in line 601, and inserting "eighteen," so as to read, "eighteen clerks at $900 each;" by striking out, in lines 604 and 605, the words "17,184" and inserting "1,584;" and by striking out, in line 591, the words "74,200" and inserting "83,800."

Mr. McMILLAN. I understood that the amendment was to reduce expenditures.

Mr. ATKINS. It does make a reduction of about $9,000 in the aggregate. There is a reduction of seven in the number of clerks.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLEY. I now move, with the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to strike out, in line 515, (being the paragraph containing appropriations for the office of the First Auditor,) the words "five clerks of class 4" and inserting "six clerks of class 4," and making a corresponding change in the total of the paragraph. This amendment is to correct what appears to have been a mistake in preparing or copying the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. Does my colleague [Mr. DIBRELL] object to that?

Mr. DIBRELL. Is it to correct an error?

Mr. ATKINS. I do not know that there is any error. I do not think there is. But the Department wants this clerk.

Mr. KELLEY. I understood it was an error.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I have one further amendment which does not increase the apppropriation at all. I move to amend by adding after the word "dollars" in line 1502 these words:

And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to rent such buildings as may be necessary from time to time for the purpose of the census, to be paid for from the amount authorized to be expended by section 20 of the act approved March 3, 1879, in reference to the Federal census.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I ask unanimous consent to go back to offer an amendment to line 1260. Before offering the amendment I will ask the Clerk to read a communication on this subject.

Mr. SPARKS. Is this a proposition to go back?

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I desire to go back to make an amendment in line 1260.

Mr. SPARKS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the parts of the bill which have been passed over.

The Clerk read as follows:

For defraying the expenses of the Supreme Court and circuit and district courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia, and also for jurors and witnesses, and expenses of suits in which the United States are concerned, of prosecutions for offenses committed in violation of the laws of the United States, and for the safe-keeping of prisoners, $2,800,000: Provided, That the per diem pay of each juror, grand or petit, in any court of the United States, shall be $2, and that the last clause of section 800 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which refers to the State of Pennsylvania, and sections 801, 820, and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, are hereby repealed; and that all such jurors, grand and petit, including those summoned during the session of the court, shall be publicly drawn from a box containing the names of not less than three hundred persons, possessing the qualifications prescribed in section 800 of the Revised Statutes, which names shall have been placed therein by the clerk of such court and a commissioner, to be appointed by the judge thereof, which commissioner shall be a citizen residing in the district in which such court is held of good standing and a well-known member of the principal political party opposing that to which the clerk may belong, the clerk and said commissioner each to place one name in said box alternately until the whole number required shall be placed therein. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any judge in a district in which such is now the practice from ordering the names of jurors to be drawn from the boxes used by the State authorities in selecting jurors in the highest courts of the State; and no person shall serve as a petit juror more than one term in any one year, and all juries to serve in courts after the passage of this act shall be drawn in conformity herewith. All general and special laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed: And provided further, That the following sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, namely, sections 2016, 2018, and 2020, and all of the succeeding sections of said statutes down to and including section 2027, and also section 5522, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that section 2017 be amended by striking out of the first line thereof as printed in the Revised Statutes the words "and required;" and that section 2019 be amended by striking out of said section in lines 11 and 12 as printed in the Revised Statutes the words "for the purpose of engaging in the work of canvassing the ballots," and by striking out from line 13 of said section as printed in said statutes the words "in respect to such canvass."

Mr. WHITE. I raise the question of order as to that portion of the clause after the word "dollars" in line 2008 to the word "repealed" in line 2035. The words referred to are as follows:

And that the last clause of section 800 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which refers to the State of Pennsylvania, and sections 801, 820, and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, are hereby repealed; and that all such jurors, grand and petit, including those summoned during the session of the court, shall be publicly drawn from a box containing the names of not less than three hundred persons, possessing the qualifications prescribed in section 800 of the Revised Statutes, which names shall have been placed therein by the clerk of such court and a commissioner, to be appointed by the judge thereof, which commissioner shall be a citizen residing in the district in which such court is held, of good standing and a well-known member of the principal political party opposing that to which the clerk may belong, the clerk and said commissioner each to place one name in said box alternately until the whole number required shall be placed therein. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any judge in a district in which such is now the practice from ordering the names of jurors to be drawn from the boxes used by the State authorities in selecting jurors in the highest courts of the State; and no person shall serve as a petit juror more than one term in any one year, and all juries to serve in courts after the passage of this act shall be drawn in conformity herewith. All general and special laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

My point of order is that that changes existing law and does not retrench expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair knows no rule which allows the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make the point of order on a part of a paragraph.

Mr. WHITE. I do it for the reason that it is an independent proposition. If there was a motion made to strike out the entire clause or the entire portion of the section I have stated, it would be perfectly proper to do so, or to call for a division of the question on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the right of the gentleman to call for a division of the question on every substantive proposition.

Mr. WHITE. I submit, with all deference to the Chair, that if I can call for a division of the question I can also divide the proposition for the purpose of raising the point of order. I will remark, then, that the portion of the bill included within the lines I have just indicated makes a separate and distinct proposition, which does change existing law. That portion provides for the repeal of certain statutes, and I submit it is entirely proper for me to raise the point of order upon it separate from the balance of this portion of the bill. The proposition is so plain that a statement of the proposition itself carries with it sufficient argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may save the gentleman from Pennsylvania time by stating that he recognizes the right of any member to demand a division of the question on every substantive proposition in a paragraph, but he does not know of any rule or any practice which allows any member to subject any portion of a paragraph to a point of order. The Chair will entertain any point of order the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to make on the paragraph, but not on portions of the paragraph.

Mr. WHITE. By the permission of the Chair I will succinctly state my point again, with a brief argument. I certainly think the Chair misapprehends the point I raise. It is so clear to my mind that I cannot see how the Chair can incline to overrule it. The point is, that that portion of the bill after the word "dollars," in the two thousand and eighth line, to and including the word "repealed" in the two thousand and thirty-fifth line, is improperly in the bill, because it changes existing law and does not retrench expenditures. Under Rule 120 these words are clearly irregularly and improperly in this bill. Now, sir, let us examine the matter a moment. I am not arguing the merits of the proposition; but if it can be ruled out as improperly placed in the bill, we will save much discussion and valuable time. Rule 120, then, which is often referred to, provides, "nor shall any provision in any such bill" (appropriation bill, which this is) "or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures." With all the tortuous construction this rule has received, these words carry a meaning too obvious for discussion. No provision shall be in order which changes existing law, unless it is germane to the subject-matter and shall retrench expenditures. What, then, is this provision? From "dollars" in line 2008 to "repealed" in 2035 there is a complete subject, and is a complete paragraph in itself, ending with a full period. It provides the last clause of section 800 of Revised Statutes shall be repealed. This clause is, "This section shall not apply to juries to serve in the courts of the United States in Pennsylvania." This is a change of existing law, but where are expenditures retrenched by it? Next, sections 801, 820, and 821 Revised Statutes shall be repealed. What are they? Let me read:

SEC. 801. Jurors to serve in the courts of the United States in Pennsylvania shall be designated by lot or otherwise, in each district respectively, according to the mode of forming juries, to serve in the highest courts of law therein, which was practiced before the passage of the act of July 29, 1840, chapter 47, so far as the same shall render such designation practicable by the courts and marshals of the United States. But this provision is subject to the provisions relating to the qualifications and oaths of jurors hereinafter contained.

SEC. 820. The following shall be causes of disqualification and challenge of grand and petit jurors in the courts of the United States, in addition to the causes existing by virtue of section 812, namely: Without duress and coercion to have taken up arms or to have joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; to have adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; to have given, directly or indirectly, any assistance in money, arms, horses, clothes, or anything whatever, to or for the use or benefit of any person whom the giver of such assistance knew to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States, or whom he had good ground to believe to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; or to have counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion, or to resist with force of arms the laws of the United States.

SEC. 821. At every term of any court of the United States the district attorney, or other person acting on behalf of the United States in said court, may move, and the court, in their discretion, may require the clerk to tender to every person summoned to serve as a grand or petit juror, or venireman or talesman, in said court, the following oath or affirmation, namely: "You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will support the Constitution of the United States of America; that you have not, without duress and constraint, taken up arms or joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; that you have not adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; that you have not, directly or indirectly, given any assistance in money or any other thing to any person or persons whom you knew, or had good ground to believe, to have joined, or to be about to join, said insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; and that you have not counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion against, or to resist with force of arms, the laws of the United States." Any person declining to take said oath shall be discharged by the court from serving on the grand or petit jury, or venire, to which he may have been summoned.

These sections are existing law. This clause repeals, wipes them from existence, thus changing existing law. Wherein does this repeal retrench expenditures? I pause for reply. The clause supplies the law thus repealed by providing for filling the box with the names of not less than three hundred persons having qualifications prescribed by section 800, and further providing for the appointment of a commissioner residing in the district by the judge of United States court, of opposite politics to the clerk, but to act with him in selecting jurors, thus creating a new officer to be paid and in this way increasing instead of retrenching expenses. This, then, sir, is substantially the whole of the clause that I maintain is out of order here, because it clearly changes existing law and does not in any way retrench expenditures. I am not speaking of the merits or policy of this change, but of its regularity in this way. If it is wise and proper legislation let it be made the subject of an independent bill and come deliberately and in order before the House.

But, sir, a word more as to this being part of a paragraph. Will this position be seriously relied on to overrule me? Why, look at this clause. It is a separate and distinctive subject-matter which can stand or fall by itself. The part indicated as not in order and read above, the Chair rather intimates, I trust has not yet decided, is not an entire paragraph. Certainly it is. What is a paragraph? If you recall the etymology of the word it is synonymous with "sentence," "proposition," "period." Look at what is objected to and tell me if it is not a complete proposition, complete period; nay more, an entire, complete subject-matter? What follows this clause? Propositions to repeal sections 2016, 2018, 2020, and other following sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the appointment of supervisors and marshals for elections. A different, an entirely different subject-matter from the selection of jurors. Why, sir, if this whole matter was now before the House I could call for a division of the question, and the request would be parliamentary, because each proposition—the juror proposition and the election feature—could stand by itself; one could be voted down and yet the other remain without affecting the sense of the whole section.

Not regular to make a point of order on a part of a paragraph, if this is a part of one! Why, sir, a few moments ago the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] offered on page 86 to increase the stenographic force in the Attorney-General's Office from one to two. I raised the point that it changed existing law. The present occupant of the chair sustained me. Suppose, instead of the amendment offered on the floor, it had been in a bill as reported from the committee and in the text, would not the point have been sustained that it changed existing law and did not retrench expenditures? Yet, sir, that is but part of a paragraph. The whole paragraph, beginning on page 85 of your bill, relates to salaries of Attorney-General, assistants, and clerks. Yet I raised a point to a part of that paragraph a few moments ago, and was sustained. I repeat again, that if the part of the bill indicated above as out of order here is but a portion of a paragraph, our courts in passing on the constitutionality of statutes have time and again sustained part of the statute and decided another part as invalid. On this ground it is competent to rule out part of a paragraph. But, sir, the proposition to my mind is so clear that further argument is useless. Were the chairman sitting as a judge in a court of justice, passing upon a question of private right regulated by our rules as law, and I standing as an advocate to raise the point I do here against the pending proposition as affecting my client, I cannot doubt the decision would be in my favor. Should not the same rule obtain in the decisions of a quasi-judicial body such as the American Congress?

Mr. ATKINS. The uniform practice of the House confirms the decision of the Chair on that subject, that there has never been a division of a paragraph for such a purpose.

Mr. WHITE. There is nothing in Rule 120 in conflict with the position I take.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to be heard?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do.

Mr. WHITE. Does the Chair make that decision?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not wish to cut off the gentleman from Massachusetts if he wishes to be heard.

Mr. WHITE. I have made the point of order; does the Chair overrule it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not wish to be impolite to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WHITE. I beg pardon; I did not hear the Chair nor know the gentleman from Massachusetts was on the floor now.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the courtesy which allows me to say what I desire on this point of order. It was my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to make the same point now made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Therefore I trust I will not be regarded as an intruder in this discussion.

Mr. WHITE. Not at all.

Mr. ROBINSON. I intended to make the same point, and I desire to submit some reasons why the chairman should sustain it. I ask first that Rule 120 be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Mr. ROBINSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, the portion of the bill upon which I wish to make the point of order is nearly the same as that designated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but not quite the same; and I now state it so there may be no misapprehension. I should not include the last line he has included: "all general and special laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed." If the Chair desires I should make my point of order excluding those words, I would prefer to do it rather than lose any right I may have.

Mr. WHITE. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me, I will say that I accept his suggestion and exclude from the point of order those words, as they will affect the pay.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to ask the Chair if I am limited to five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appreciates the discretion which usage has given to the Chair in permitting latitude in discussions on points of order. The Chair is willing to be further advised on the point of order, but he does not wish gentlemen to go beyond the five-minute rule on any point of order that is discussed.

Mr. ROBINSON. I should not be able to state in five minutes what I desire to say on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not propose to cut the gentleman off in his statement.

Mr. ROBINSON. I deem it very important that this point should be settled at the present time. As I understand, the integrity and permanence of Rule 120 depend largely on the view that the Chair shall take upon the point now raised. If this point of order is not sustained, I foretell that this House will very soon lose all confidence in Rule 120, and will not suffer it long to remain upon its book.

The precise point is this. The rule says:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

The Chair will notice at the outset the rule does not say "paragraph," it does not say "section," it does not say "bill," but it says:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment.

That is, a particular portion of a bill or amendment.

Now, this is a provision in a bill, or these are provisions in this bill to which the point of order lies. What is a "provision?" Why, it decidedly is a measure, as it is commonly defined; something separate and distinct in itself; something that will stand alone; a proposition, in other words; not the same as a proviso, because that is a provision upon a condition, a conditional measure; and we have numerous instances of those in this very bill. So that the line is to be very carefully observed. Now, I say that here, in this very section under discussion, we have, in the first place, the general provisions for appropriations down to and including the two thousand and fifth line. Then we have a provision that the per diem pay of each juror shall be reduced to $2. That is one provision distinct by itself. It might stop there and the sense be complete.

Now, what next? We have between the lines I have indicated, from line 2008 down to 2034, three separate provisions more for the repeal of certain statutes: in reference to the drawing of jurors; in reference to the oath and qualifications of jurors; in reference to the term that they shall serve in any one year. Now, will any one say these are not separate provisions? Will any one say that they depend upon the question of the fees of jurors? Not at all.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the provision of the statutes that relates to the fees of jurors is included in section 852, in quite another chapter, which does not include the sections 800 and 801, and also 820 and 821, cited below. If the Chairman is to rule that "paragraph" is the same as "provision" and "provision" the same as "paragraph," then I submit to the Chair that this committee might entertain a bill that should repeal the entire judiciary act, a whole title of the statutes, including some twenty-odd sections of them, and I do not know how many pages, I think over a hundred, of the Revised Statutes.

I do not make the point that there is any objection to that portion of the paragraph which reduces the pay of jurors. Clearly that is germane; and though it changes existing law, it retrenches, and is therefore admissible; but the other provisions, though germane, change existing law and do not retrench. I presume no one would claim that there is any saving in the provisions within those lines I have cited in that portion of the paragraph to which the point of order is made.

This question, as I understand, is a new one, as presented to the House. On such examination of the record as I have been able to make, and on inquiry of gentlemen who have been members of the House for many years, I do not find that this precise question has been raised. It has not been passed upon so far as I have been able to ascertain.

But we must look at the condition of things when this rule was changed. Mr. Chairman, you know very well that in the interpretation of a statute it is always of the utmost materiality that we go back to see the condition of things at the time of the enactment. In the construction of a statute we find what was the mischief then see what remedy has been provided and examine the scope of that remedy. The rule prior to the amendment of Rule 120 I would like to have read in order that we may understand exactly the change that was made. I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bill nor be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government.

Mr. ROBINSON. That was the rule prior to 1876. In the Forty-fourth Congress it was found that the rule was open to this objection: that by the interpretation given to it the Speaker could entertain an amendment that would increase salaries, and therefore expenditures; but it would not be in order to move an amendment to reduce expenditures. And the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania who is now the Speaker of the House—I do not at present see him on the floor, but if he were here, with his recollection of what transpired, he would remember without difficulty that what the House then sought to meet was its inability to entertain an amendment that reduced expenditures, while it could entertain one that increased salaries.

The rule was referred to the Committee on Rules, consisting of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] and others; and Mr. COX, of New York, reported a change in the rules, and the precise change that was made is now contained in Rule 120, and that language was adopted advisedly.

What was the mischief, Mr. Chairman, at that time? Did the House of Representatives propose to change its rules so that it might change existing laws? That was not the desire of the House. It was to change the rules so that expenditures might be reduced. It was so stated in that debate several times.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] took part in that debate and he explained the purpose of the committee to that effect very plainly. I ask the Clerk to read from the debate that followed in order to indicate what was the evil complained of and what was the view of the House in the adoption of that amendment to the rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COX. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. I can state to the House in a very few words the object of this amendment as I understand it. We propose to modify this rule because, as the Committee on Rules believe, or at least as I think, a forced construction was put upon a portion of the rule, under which any salary was allowed to be increased, though the opportunity was never given to decrease a salary. Now the committee propose to go "right about face" and adopt a rule that will make it in order at any time to reduce salaries or to retrench the expenditures of money by Congress if the object of reduction or retrenchment is germane to the bill itself.

* * * * * * * * *

Mr. BANKS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] allow me to say a word?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, the object of the proposition now before the House, as it has been stated, seems to me to be right. The purpose is that, as the rule, or the construction of the rule, now gives the House the privilege of amending an appropriation bill by increasing salaries, it shall likewise give to the House the privilege of decreasing salaries. That is stated to be the object, and so far it is a good one. Am I right in stating that to be the object?

Mr. RANDALL. It is.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is the history of the adoption of this change in the rules, and it will be seen that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] distinctly declared the purpose of this amendment, and no language could be plainer than his was on that action. His purpose was to economize, not to empower the House in an appropriation bill to change existing laws except for the purpose of economy. He was fighting the condition of things in which an amendment to increase an appropriation was allowed, but not one to decrease it. Does it say there in what has been read that he proposes to empower the Committee on Appropriations to change existing laws without regard to retrenchment? No; he says directly the opposite. He says that the anticipations of gentlemen who oppose this amendment are purely imaginary and not founded on the provisions of the amendment proposed. I say, therefore, that he saw the word "provision" meant something very different from "bill, paragraph, section, or amendment."

Now it says, "provision in such bill or amendment." Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that this did not come from a committee as a part of a bill, but that some gentleman on the floor offered it as an amendment, as was done by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] at the last session, it would be a provision and not an amendment. Here it is a provision in the bill, and there are several provisions in the bill of this character. The word provision has a distinct meaning in law that these gentlemen will recognize.

Now, it is very singular, on this very question, that we have here before us section 800, of which I will read the first two lines in order that the Chairman may understand it. They are that—

Jurors to serve in the courts of the United States, in each State respectively, shall have the same qualifications, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained.

"Provisions hereinafter contained." Now we go on to the next section, the last clause of section 801 which this amendment seeks to repeal; what does it say? "But this provision is subject to the provisions relating to the qualification and oaths of jurors hereinafter contained." This provision is subject to the provisions hereinafter contained. What is this provision thus alluded to? Why, the first part of section 801. The very provision that this amendment seeks to repeal says that this portion which it is proposed to strike out of the law is subject to the provisions "hereinafter contained." What more? It says those "provisions relating to the qualifications and oaths of jurors." These provisions are sections 820 and 821, and the words are used all through the statutes.

Turn over to the title of "repeal." It is headed "repeal provisions." One section states that the enactments of this revision shall not be held to affect provisions, whether local or otherwise, in general appropriation bills. The language is retained, and it is very clearly stated all through the statutes.

Now, is it to be supposed for a moment that when these gentlemen framed the rule and brought it into the House they did not understand what it meant to say, and that the House did not comprehend that they used the word "provision" and used it advisedly? And that covers the whole case. It is specific and well understood.

I know very well that the argument of inconvenience is not very strong, but if it is in the power of any member of this House or of a committee, either by an amendment or a bill, to say that the pay of jurors shall be reduced twenty-five cents a day, for instance, and to go on then and change all the chapters referring to the judiciary, for instance providing for new proceedings under the writ of habeas corpus, would not that be a "provision?"

In your own State, Mr. Chairman, there is one judicial district. Now, I submit would it not be a provision if an amendment should be offered here that two judicial districts should be constituted in the State of Kentucky? The State of Pennsylvania has two judicial districts. Could that number be changed and would not that change constitute a provision in the eye of this rule? So in regard to rules of evidence, the duties of marshals and district attorneys, and I might go on through the whole of this chapter, one hundred and eleven pages, of the statutes. It might as well be said that any one of them is not a provision as to say that these which are instanced here are not provisions.

Now, where shall we stand if we go on in this way? I do not include that portion of the bill in regard to the election laws, because I say at once that that portion stands upon an altogether different basis. The claim may be there made that that provision does retrench expenditure.

But no man, as I understand it, can claim that this change in the method of drawing jurors will save a single dollar to the Government. I do not say that the Committee on Appropriations, or the gentleman who introduced this bill, designedly included a reduction of the pay of jurors in order that he might lug in something else; I have no knowledge of that fact. But I do say that if the Chair does not sustain this point of order, if the Chair does not say that these are provisions by themselves, then the door is flung wide open, and it will be in the power of any member of this House to move something germane to the section, and then go on to repeal the entire body of the statutes, so far as it can be done and keep the amendment germane. The language of the rule is "germane to the subject-matter of the bill," not germane throughout itself. It is not necessary that these provisions should be germane the one to the other, but that each shall be germane to the bill. I make no question that these are germane; they are clearly so. So would be a change of judicial districts; so would be a change in regard to the writ of habeas corpus; so would be a change of the rules of evidence and the matter of witnesses before the courts.

Shortly after this rule was adopted, within about three months, it came up for construction and was submitted to the then Speaker of the House for his ruling. That was on the question of the transfer of the Indian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department. It turned upon the question whether upon its face the proposed amendment retrenched expenditures or not.

In the debate at that time I find that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] saw the dangers to which this rule might lead unless it was upheld strictly. I will say in that case it was held strictly by the Speaker of the House at that time.

I ask that the remarks of Mr. COX at that time may be read by the Clerk; they are very brief. I ask it because he reported this amended rule from the Committee on Rules; he understood its scope; he saw the danger into which the House might be led if the rule was not strictly maintained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the ruling of the Chair.
Mr. COX. I desire to say a word on this question.
Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman.
Mr. COX. I had the honor to report this rule to the House. I believe it was unanimously adopted, or nearly so, by the Committee on Rules. I never dreamed that this rule would have so loose an interpretation as has been given to it. I never dreamed that it would be carried so far as that you might tack on legislation that would extend to every department of the Government, as would be the case if this point of order be not well taken.

Mr. ROBINSON. I really wish that the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] were now on the floor, able to interest us as he always can in his statement of his fears. He says there that he is alarmed at the views that some gentlemen take of the scope of this rule; he who reported the rule from his own committee only three months before.

I am aware that discussions upon points of order are almost always uninteresting. I do not care to gain distinction in this House by raising points of order. But I believe that this is the time and this is the place when it is in the power of the Chairman of this committee to make such a ruling as shall define the word "provision" and retain the force of the rule. The effort to change the pay of jurors may still be successful.

I do not desire to anticipate the point of order that may be made upon the provisions in relation to supervisors and marshals. As I intimated a moment ago, they seem to retrench expenditures. But in this case the repealing of the oath of the jurors, the repealing of the measures for the qualifications of jurors, and the adoption of a new method for drawing jurors cannot be of so much consequence that a rule of this House must be set aside in order to permit those amendments to be introduced at this time.

The rule should be conservatively administered, not loosely construed. I submit that the Chair must rule, I say it respectfully, that the true construction of this rule is that each one of these separate provisions in the bill and forming a part of the bill is open to a point of order. I call the attention of the Chair to the wording of the rule, because in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania the Chair intimated that he must make a point of order on the paragraph. The Chair must rule on Rule 120, and the language of the rule is not "a paragraph" but "a provision in the bill or amendment."

I have said all that is necessary to make my point clear.

Mr. ATKINS. I will say only one or two words in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON.] The proposition embraced in this bill, as I understand, is to abolish that provision of the statutes which requires jurors to take the test oath. Under the practice now existing a great many persons are summoned for the purpose of being impaneled upon juries, but not being able to take the test oath required under the statute they return to their homes, and it is necessary to summon additional jurors, creating double or perhaps treble expense. Now the proposition is to abolish the test oath, thus obviating the expense incurred by the Government in the manner I have indicated. It simplifies the proceedings in obtaining juries, and as a matter of course, in simplifying those proceedings and saving marshal's fees, &c., there is a retrenchment of expenditures. In other words, Mr. Chairman, this provision ought to be taken as a whole. It is designed as a whole. It has no practical bearing unless taken as a whole. It is not practicable to divide it up and carry out the object for which it was framed. Taken as a whole, the amendment retrenches expenditures. One provision is closely connected with another. The provisions are based one upon another; and the proposition is not harmonious unless the parts are all taken together.

Mr. ROBINSON rose.

Mr. ATKINS. I did not interrupt the gentleman; and I hope he will not interrupt me.

It seems to me the gentleman from Massachusetts has been more technical and metaphysical than practical in his objection. I am aware that the gentleman is a very cool and dispassionate speaker; he thinks closely; but it seems to me he has been rather hair-splitting than otherwise in his enforcement of his views upon this point of order. Ever since Rule 120 has been in operation the uniform ruling has been not to divide a paragraph. Among all the hundreds of rulings that have been given by different gentlemen (most of them distinguished parliamentarians) who have filled the chair in Committee of the Whole, as well as the different Speakers of the House since this rule was adopted, I challenge the gentleman to point to a single instance in which a paragraph has been divided. I do not remember one.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, these provisions stand one upon another; they do not make sense except as taken together, and I submit that in amending the law which now requires a test oath to be submitted to citizens summoned as jurors there will be great economy. Hence the point of order which the gentleman from Massachusetts urges does not lie against any of the provisions embraced in this section.

I admit that there is other subject-matter in this paragraph. The second proviso alludes to supervisors and deputy marshals. I maintain so far as that is concerned that the paragraph cannot be divided. But still supposing it to be in a different paragraph, it stands upon its own merits; and it can be shown plainly and distinctly that it as well as the former provision will, when carried into effect, work a reduction of expenditures.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman challenges me to cite an instance in which any chairman of the Committee of the Whole or any Speaker of the House has ever ruled any other way than according to the gentleman's construction. Why, it would be equally fair for me to challenge him to cite one ruling sustaining the ground that he takes.

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will allude to one. When we had under consideration at the last session the legislative appropriation bill, it contained a proposition abolishing the different geological surveys and establishing one geological survey, and providing also for the abolition of the different surveyors-general. It will be remembered that an effort was then made to divide the paragraph, and the Chair ruled that it could not be done; that the paragraph must be regarded as one harmonious whole.

Mr. ROBINSON. I remember that instance, and I remember one or two others in which such a suggestion has been made; but I believe no such case has ever come up for discussion and consideration in Committee of the Whole or in the House. I do not understand that when any view upon a point of order is presented here it is a sound answer that no one has made the point in a former Congress. Are we never to suggest anything new? Are questions of this kind to be considered as forever settled by the usages of the past?

The gentleman from Tennessee says that by this proposition expenditures are retrenched. I ask him to show the House how any retrenchment is effected by providing a new method of drawing jurors.

Mr. ATKINS. I have already explained that under the operation of the existing law a great many persons whom the gentleman styles "disloyal" are summoned as jurors and are unable to comply with the requirement as to taking the test-oath. We propose to abolish that requirement, and hence so many men will not be summoned unnecessarily to be impaneled as jurors.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman from Tennessee is certainly mistaken when he says that I have called anybody "disloyal."

Mr. ATKINS. I did not say that the gentleman did so himself; I had reference to the gentleman's party. If these men are not considered "disloyal," why is the test-oath applied to them?

Mr. WHITE. They were disloyal.

Mr. ATKINS. Exactly; "they were."

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not want this discussion to be diverted from the point of order. I am not talking about loyalty or disloyalty.

Mr. ATKINS. Nor am I.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not attempted in this House to stir up any feeling.

Mr. ATKINS. And I am the very last man on this floor to make any political or partisan allusion. I only referred to this class of persons who under existing law cannot sit as jurors, in order to show that, if the law should be repealed, deputy marshals would be relieved of a great deal of labor, and the Government would be saved much expense in the summoning of individuals who cannot take the test oath, and consequently cannot serve as jurors. In this way, as I have shown, there would be a retrenchment of expenditures.

Mr. ROBINSON. Now on the point of order he argues there may be a saving, but on this construction of the rule made by Speaker Kerr, the decision which is the precedent in this House, the Speaker said he could not go into the question of the discussion whether it might save or not. As the gentleman said, some men may be summoned as jurors who cannot serve and may have to go home again. The Speaker said he could not go into circumstances outside, but must rule on the question of the amendment itself.

And it is sufficient answer to what the gentleman from Tennessee has said when I only suggest that to meet all points of order and to override this rule completely all the committee need do, or any gentleman, is to bring a bill in one paragraph. That is all. Make your bill into one paragraph, and if your whole bill saves one dollar no man can make a point of order against it.

Does he occupy that position? Does he stand there? Punctuation has but little to do in controlling the interpretation of a law; and does the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations say that he can in his committee-room draw a bill and have it printed in such a form in one paragraph and because the whole bill saves $500 no point of order can be made on it? That is his position to-day. That position it seems to me is so utterly untenable, would so shock the common sense of this House, that it must be abandoned. And I make this point of order because I tell gentlemen that in the near future, as the gentleman from New York said in 1876, we shall go on until we have an appropriation bill in one paragraph and then where will Rule 120 be? I ask the Chair, then, to sustain the rule and to stand upon its language, that it is upon separate, distinct provisions the Chair must rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the right of any member to call for a separate vote or division of a question upon every substantive proposition involved in the measure or the amendment. But if it be concluded that for like reason a member would have the right to make a point of order on every substantive proposition in a measure or paragraph of a bill, the Chair has simply to say that he knows of no rule or practice which has ever warranted such a conclusion. The Chair is not advised of any case where a member has been permitted to subdivide a paragraph in order to subject a part of it to a point of order when the whole of it was not liable to that point of order.

The Chair does not see the danger that the gentleman from Massachusetts apprehends in the event of overruling this point of order, as it will simply result in remitting the question to the decision of the members of the House by their votes.

For reasons given at length on substantially the same point raised in the last Congress as that which the gentleman from Pennnsylvania has now raised, and which the gentleman from Massachusetts has so elaborately argued, the Chair does not hesitate in the exercise of its judgment, observing the rule as construed by all the occupants of the chair since its adoption, to overrule the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WHITE. If nobody else moves to strike out the words I have indicated I will move it myself.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not rise, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of addressing the House at this time, and may not at all, on this subject. I refrain from doing so for the reason that I did not desire to avail myself of the privilege of addressing the House, having reported this bill, because I did not feel if I did so that I could make any suggestion hereafter with regard to limiting this debate. There are seventy-odd names I understand on the chairman's list booked to address the House on this subject, and I have risen simply for the purpose of bringing before the committee the subject of the limitation of this debate. I do not know that I have any suggestion to make at all on this subject, but I feel it to be my duty from the simple fact that so many gentlemen have suggested to me the propriety of bringing the subject before the committee at the incipiency of this discussion—I felt that I ought to do so and therefore throw out this suggestion.

Mr. KEIFER. Let me suggest that we want it understood before we go into general debate that after the general debate is closed we shall have the right to offer amendments; otherwise we must move our amendments now.

Mr. ATKINS. Of course gentlemen will have that privilege.

Mr. CARLISLE. As in the Army bill.

Mr. SPARKS. It is the rule now, and the right cannot be taken away from gentlemen.

Mr. KEIFER. Would it not be better to let the debate run for a while before attempting to limit it? You do not propose to limit it now?

Mr. ATKINS. I am only throwing out suggestions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee and to the committee that before this general debate shall be gone into it would probably be best to allow the Clerk to read the only remaining paragraph of the bill, which may probably be subject to discussion. It is the paragraph from line 2052 to line 2064, inclusive.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 2028 be amended by striking out in lines 1 and 2 of said section as printed in the Revised Statutes the words "or a deputy marshal," and by striking out in line 3 of said section as printed in said statutes the words "city, town, county, parish." That all of section 2031 of said statutes, except so much thereof as relates to the pay of supervisors of elections, and that all other sections of the Revised Statutes and all laws and parts of laws authorizing the appointment of chief supervisors of elections, special or general deputy marshals of elections, and prescribing their duties and powers and allowing them compensation, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. HOOKER. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee, as to fixing the time of the debate, that each member upon the very voluminous list which I discover upon the chairman's table shall be confined to thirty minutes. I do not believe there ought to be any such list at all. I think the Committee of the Whole in this respect, like the House itself, ought to follow the rule, and that the Chair should recognize the first gentleman who rises. But inasmuch as the Speaker has followed a different rule, and the gentleman who now occupies the chair as chairman of the Committee of the Whole will probably feel constrained to adopt the same rule, I think each member who speaks on this question should be limited to twenty or thirty minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. As it is not my intention to speak on this bill, I can the better say that I do not think the gentlemen who have undertaken to discuss the questions involved here should be limited to a shorter time than an hour. If they desire to discuss the questions at all fully they cannot do it in less time; and I doubt very much the propriety of abridging their time if they think it necessary to occupy an hour.

Mr. KELLEY. I think, Mr. Chairman, by allowing freedom of speech we will come to better results. The tendency of any gentleman will be to say the strongest, I might say the most inflammatory thing he has pondered if he is confined to a limited time. These are grave questions, and, if anything can be done with deliberation in this House, I think they should be considered deliberately. We have not a pressure of business upon us, and I think, for a time at any rate, the debate had better be permitted to run freely. It is always in the control of the committee and the House, and can be as well regulated hereafter as now.

Mr. ATKINS. It is very evident that there is such a contrariety of opinions on this subject that it would be difficult to arrive at any conclusion just now. I will make one other suggestion. Possibly we may as well let the debate run for a day or two, and the House may then get the notion of fixing a time for closing it up. The Senate is waiting for us to send them this bill, and we are waiting for the Senate to dispose of the Army bill; between the two, if we continue in this position, one body waiting for the other, we may be still sitting here in the dog-days.

Mr. HOOKER. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the Senate is now in the middle of the discussion on the Army bill, and probably will continue it for two weeks; and I do not think that meanwhile our time can be more profitably occupied than in the discussion of the questions involved in this bill.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Mississippi is only guessing at the time likely to be occupied by the Senate. I suggest that we meet at eleven o'clock, as we did when we were discussing the Army bill. If we occupy five days of the week for four hours a day with the discussion of this bill, it will take two or three weeks to get through with the Chairman's list.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state for the information of the committee that the Speaker's clerk informs the present occupant of the chair that the list to which reference has been made embraces the names of ninety-six gentlemen.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well; if four speakers occupy four hours a day for five days in the week, perhaps some mathematician will inform me how long it will take to get through the list.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that perhaps some gentlemen on the list who are entitled to an hour will be satisfied with making speeches half an hour in length. For myself, I do not want to occupy more than one-half of my hour. I can in that time tell all about the fairness of Philadelphia elections——

Mr. CLYMER. Because there is nothing to tell.

Mr. O'NEILL. When republican officials conducted them and how no man was ever deprived of a legitimate vote either by marshals, by supervisors, or by policemen who were republicans. And I can also relate in that time, if not interrupted, the history of political murders at the polls and show that the democrats were responsible for them for years past and down to the present time.

Mr. CLYMER. How long will it take my colleague to tell about the unfairness of Philadelphia elections?

Mr. O'NEILL. Why, sir, I can tell all about them in half an hour, and I can even tell how fair the election in Philadelphia was when my colleague [Mr. CLYMER] was honored with the nomination of the democratic party for governor.

Mr. CARLISLE. I desire to ask what is before the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The two paragraphs of the bill which are now open for general debate.

Mr. ATKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS.]

Mr. BRAGG. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRAGG. Where the House has fixed the list of those persons who are to speak, and the order in which they are to speak, has any gentleman upon that list a right to occupy five or ten minutes himself and then farm out the balance of his time, thereby interfering with the list which the House has ordered?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that his question cannot, perhaps, be properly described as a parliamentary inquiry. But the Chair will state that he certainly does not understand that the House has fixed any list of members who are to be recognized in any particular order. Upon the contrary, the Chair understands that a report was made upon that subject from the Committee on Rules and adopted by the House, which directed the occupant of the chair to accept the list as simply advising him of the wish of members thereon to be heard, but the Chair was not required to observe the order in which their names stood upon the list.

Mr. BRAGG. I have attained all I desire by my inquiry.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, the discussion in this House since the introduction of the appropriation bills has assumed a wide range; and while I have been deeply pained by the current it has taken on the other side, I also regret that some things have been said in the heat of debate on this side which have unintentionally given aid and comfort to our opponents. It is not practicable on this stormy arena of passion and prejudice to vindicate the true history of the late war; this must be left to the impartial verdict of coming ages; and no wise purpose can be subserved here by reviving the dead issues of the past. I claim to be here for present practicable purposes. My firm resolution has been to do nothing that would assist the republican leaders to again array parties in this country on sectional lines. The consummation of this design on their part would not only result in the further discomfiture of my own section, but would end in the destruction of the happiness and liberties of the whole American people.

The amendments embraced in the bill now under discussion for appropriations to the civil service are classed under two heads; the change of existing laws in reference to the organization of juries in the Federal courts; and the repeal of certain United States statutes in reference to elections of Representatives. As to the first it is not necessary for me to do more than to give them a passing notice. No intelligent honest man in America acquainted with the subject can take issue with us on the existence of an imperative demand for an amendment of these jury laws. The right of a fair trial by a competent and impartial jury is the first, highest, most essential right of a freeman. A system now prevailing in the South which poisons the fountains of justice and places the lives, liberty, and property of the people at the mercy of ignorant and packed juries, deserves and will receive the execrations of all good and just men. I cannot believe that there will be any serious opposition to the amendments under this head.

As to the second class of amendments, the repeal of certain sections of the Revised Statutes pertaining to elections, I purpose to devote my time to only one phase of the question, the constitutionality of these sections, which depends for its solution upon the true construction of section 4, article 1, of the Federal Constitution, in these words:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Before entering upon the discussion of this subject, I deem it proper to say that there is no man on this floor who more zealously favors free and fair elections than myself. There is no man in my district, white or black, democrat or republican, who has ever charged or would charge that I have ever given countenance to any illegal or unfair act in the conduct of elections, or that I would for the sake of office or other consideration intrench upon the right of any citizen to cast unawed the ballot of his election.

As I propose to discuss a constitutional question I hope the committee will bear with me. I know it is fashionable in these latter days to deride constitutional arguments. Yet in all our history a clear understanding of the Constitution was never so important as in this generation. The great need of the country is a great constitutional party of the people to save it from the blight of despotic tendencies to centralized power on the one hand and the chaos and confusion of repudiation and communism on the other. The South concedes all the legitimate results of the war—the impossibility of secession, the freedom and political equality of the negro, and a free and full acceptance of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. But if the democratic party goes further and listens to the voice of the consol*idationist*, which everywhere boasts that the structure and principles of the Government have been radically changed by the events of the war, then all will be lost.

Mr. Chairman, in our fundamental law there is no more vital and important part than this fourth section of the first article. It involves the whole theory of our Government. If rightly interpreted it will shed a genial light over this land; otherwise, "shadows, clouds, and darkness rest upon it." As it is both a grant of power to the States and to the General Government its correct meaning can only be reached through a full comprehension of our Federal system. This system is familiar to us all, but it possesses a few prominent features which we must not lose sight of in this argument. The real sovereignty of this country is in the people of the United States; but this sovereignty is partially represented in the State governments and partially represented in the Federal Government; and wherever it has an abiding-place it loses none of its majesty or its sanctity and its claims to the obedience of the citizen. It is as much our duty to uphold the States in their reserved rights as it is to uphold the General Government in its delegated powers; with this distinction, settled by the late war, that in case of hostile conflict the supremacy of the Federal authority must be maintained; for in such a conflict the Federal authority while struggling for its own life must necessarily preserve the existence of the States; or, as Chief-Justice Chase said, "the States can exist without the Federal Government, but the latter could not survive a moment upon the destruction of the former."

Hence we see, in construing the Constitution, the necessity of constant reference to the theory of our complex system of government, and of yielding to that exposition which would best preserve both the State and General Government, and best harmonize with the spirit and genius of free and popular institutions, for the security of which all our constitutions are established. If a section of the Constitution is reasonably susceptible of two constructions, the one being consistent with these great objects, the other dangerous thereto, the first must be received. The section now under consideration was fully discussed in all the State conventions called to ratify the Federal Constitution, and in all there was a difference of opinion as to the true construction of this section, while in the first convention of North Carolina, which refused to ratify the Constitution, it was specially classed with a few others as the "most ambiguous and exceptionable parts" of the proposed instrument.

From that day till now those who have contended for a latitudinous construction of the Constitution have held that the power given to the General Government over the management of elections for Representatives is absolute and supreme, and can be exercised by it whenever and however it pleases, without reference to the action or wishes of the States; while those who have claimed in the interest of liberty a strict construction of doubtful grants have contended that the power given to the General Government by this section was a life-preserving power to be exercised for that object only; that is to say, if the States should fail, refuse, or neglect to prescribe regulations as to time, place, and manner of holding elections for Congressmen, or by invasion or rebellion were temporarily disabled from performing these functions, then the General Government, to prevent its own dissolution, should "make such regulations;" or, if the States should exercise the grant in a manner inconsistent with its intention or destructive of free institutions, that is, if they should prescribe "impracticable times, unreasonable places, and odious methods," then the General Government could put forth its ultimate power to "alter such regulations." This latter construction is the one for which I contend. And this I do, not only because it is in the interest of liberty and in accord with the true theory of our complex system of government, but because it will stand the test of the great canons of constitutional construction.

Chief-Justice Marshall, in the celebrated case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, lays down the rule that in determining the extent of any grant of power to Congress we must look not only to the words themselves and their subject-matter but to the purpose to be subserved in making the grant.

In the first place the words of this section are peculiar and deserve special attention. In reference to the States it says "they shall" by their Legislatures prescribe the times, places, and manner of elections for Senators and Representatives in Congress. This, taken in connection with article 6, which imposes upon the members of the several State Legislatures the oath to support the Constitution, makes it imperative for the State assemblies to prescribe these regulations. The word "shall" as here used conveys the idea of duty—original, unavoidable, continuous duty. Whereas in the clause delegating the power to the General Government it says Congress "may" at any time make or alter such regulations. The word "may" in this connection implies license, discretion—not duty. But in governments founded upon law discretion cannot be exercised arbitrarily when it comes in conflict with duties imposed even upon inferior jurisdictions, and can only be exerted when there is a necessity for purposes higher and beyond those embraced within such duties.

In this case, therefore, such discretion can only be exercised for the higher and ultimate intention of preserving life. In other words the reasonable import of the terms of this section is that the right to prescribe these regulations is primary with the States and ultimate with the General Government. Mr. Hamilton, himself, in the very letters of the Federalist read in the debate on the Army appropriation bill by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] draws this distinction and speaks of this section as giving this right "to the States primarily and to Congress ultimately." The word "ultimate" in connection with a right has a signification as well accepted in governmental science as the word "appeal" has in legal jurisprudence. An ultimate right in a government is not an original or concurrent right, but is one to be used as a last resort, in extreme cases, and for purposes lying beyond those immediately implied in the primary right. So much for the language of the grant.

If we look to its subject-matter we find that it affects not only the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives in Congress, but through these the right of representation of the States and people by men of their own free choice, the sole protection left to them when they delegated so much of their sovereign powers to the General Government. This choice, so essential to their liberties, is never safe except when they are allowed to prescribe the time, place, and manner of elections. If this right is not primary, fundamental, and exclusive so long as properly exercised, then the right to a full and free representation in Congress is a delusion and a snare. If the power of the General Government in this behalf is original, supreme, and arbitrary, then there are innumerable ways by which it could legally and practically destroy the free representation of the people. Suppose a State is moving appropriately in its orbit, and has in a proper manner prescribed the regulations affecting the time, place, and manner of holding these elections of Representatives, and at the same time and place and in the same manner all of its State officers are to be chosen, as is now the custom in most of the States; suppose further that the party in control of the General Government was adverse to the politics of this State, and should prescribe a different place and a different manner of holding the election for Representatives; in other words, that the State law should say each elector must vote in his own township, and the Federal law should say he must vote at the court-house of his county. Here the elector could have no free choice; for wherever he voted he would be liable to the penal statute of one or the other jurisdiction. In addition it would be impracticable for those living in remote townships to vote at both places on the same day. But this would necessarily go further, the State authorities could only appoint officers to hold elections at the places designated by the State law; and thus would arise the necessity for Congress to provide for the appointment and compensation of their own judges, inspectors, returning officers, returning boards, and marshals, who, clothed with the superior power and backed with the armed forces of the General Government, would override the State officers, and could and would arrest them in case of conflict. Such a conflict would destroy liberty in this country and increase the power and patronage of the President beyond the wildest dreams of the most determined consolidationists in America.

Let us next examine the purpose for which this grant of power was made to Congress, in order to ascertain its true meaning and extent. It has never been denied, in fact since the Constitution was first submitted to the people of the States for ratification it has been admitted, that the purpose was to enable the General Government to preserve its own life. It was in this connection that Mr. Hamilton said that "every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation." This being the object of the grant of power to Congress, then, according to the cardinal rule laid down by Chief-Justice Marshall, the true construction must conform to its purpose and hold it within the bounds and scope thereof. This is reasonable, convenient, and incontrovertible, and brings us again to the true meaning, that the power conferred on Congress is ultimate and can only be put in force when necessary to preserve national life. This construction may be contrary to the first apprehensions of members even on this side of the House, but to this complexion true democracy must come at last. It was so held by the greatest founders of this Government and all the disciples of liberty that came after them.

When Mr. Jay was called upon in the New York convention to explain this section he acknowledged that he had doubts upon the subject, and said that he feared the General Government might misconstrue and abuse it. He asserted that every government was defective unless it had the power of preserving itself. He said the obvious meaning of the paragraph was that if by design or accident the States should neglect or fail to appoint Representatives, Congress should have the power to prevent a dissolution of the Government. He was satisfied this was the design of the Federal Constitution. In the Massachusetts convention Samuel Adams took the same position. In the convention of Virginia, Mr. Monroe asked Mr. Madison "for information respecting the clause concerning elections." He wished to know why Congress had been given an ultimate control of the time, place, and manner of elections for Representatives. You perceive from the language of this question that Mr. Monroe understood the power given to Congress to be ultimate and not original or concurrent. Mr. Madison answered that "it was found impossible to fix the time, place, and manner of the election of Representatives in the Constitution. It was found necessary to leave the regulation of these in the first place to the State governments, as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government, in order to produce uniformity and prevent its own dissolution."

It may be asked, if this construction was generally conceded in the formation of the Government, why did seven of the States in their conventions of ratification propose amendments to this clause? The answer is obvious. Because the section was ambiguous and might afford in the hands of a reckless dominant party a pretext for the assumption of extraordinary and doubtful powers; and our forefathers, ever jealous of the encroachments of power, desired to leave no room for doubt. In the same way the tenth amendment was proposed. Without this tenth amendment no true democrat could have denied that the true construction of the Constitution would be that all powers not delegated to the General Government, nor prohibited to the States, were reserved to the States or the people. So the States who proposed amendments to this fourth section were only desirous to put a vital matter beyond all doubt and cavil. Listen to the ever-memorable words of the preamble of the resolution of the New York convention proposing an amendment to the clause under consideration:

> Whereas it is essential to the preservation of the rights of the several States and the freedom of the people, under the operation of the Federal Government, that the right of prescribing the manner, time and places of holding the elections to the Federal Legislature should be forever inseparably annexed to the sovereignty of the several States, this convention doth declare that the same ought to remain to all posterity a perpetual and fundamental right in the local exclusive of the interference of the General Government, except in cases where the Legislatures of the States shall refuse or neglect to perform or fulfill the same according to the tenor of the Constitution.

And in their ordinance of ratification they expressly declare such to be their understanding of the Constitution as it is, and they only proposed the amendment to remove all doubt on the subject.

For these reasons, and others that I might assign if time would permit, I confidently announce in the language of Justice Clifford when he was a member of this House, and who was as great a statesman as he is now exalted as a judge—

> 1. That the power in the States to prescribe the time, place, and manner of holding elections is exclusive so long as they continue to perform the duty imposed upon them by the Constitution.
> 2. That if the States neglect or refuse to make regulations Congress has full power over the subject, as a self-preserving principle in the Government.
> 3. That any attempt at jurisdiction over the subject till the States shall have omitted or become unable to act for themselves is a positive violation of the true intent and meaning of the Federal compact, and cannot have any binding effect upon the people of the States.

Since the veto power of the President has been dragged into this debate I was desirous of discussing it with some fullness, but I am admonished that my time will not admit of it. Upon this question I hold the true doctrine to be that the President has under the Constitution as much right to veto a bill as we have to pass it. With Mr. Calhoun, I believe this to be one of the wisest provisions of that great instrument, being not only essential to the protection of the executive department from legislative encroachment, but as securing in the law-making power the concurrent voice of one who is elected by and represents the whole people of the United States. Like the power of the Roman tribunes, it performs one of the most wholesome functions known to popular government. Each of us is elected by the people of one district and is immediately responsible to them; but the President is elected by the whole people and owes his accountability to all. No man who has proper respect for his own character and the opinions of just and good men or looks to posterity for the vindication of his motives could be controlled in the exercise of this high prerogative by partisan considerations. Invoking the guidance of a higher power he must look to his oath, to the Constitution, and to the welfare of the whole country.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that grave apprehensions are felt on account of the growing power of the Chief Executive in this land; but this power has never been acquired by the exercise or possession of the veto. No, sir; the danger lies in the immense and growing patronage of the President. And who is responsible for this? Why, the legislative department, by the exercise of unconstitutional and doubtful powers, has built up the patronage of the President to its present alarming proportions; and in no other way could his powers have become dangerous to liberty and the existence of popular institutions.

These reflections induce me to believe that the President will not veto the appropriation bills of this extra session. I am of the opinion that he intends doing what he thinks to be right; and I cannot see how he could justify such a veto under the Constitution or by any sense of duty to the whole country. I know his own party mostly desire it, and the leaders of that party on this floor are endeavoring, by the pressure of party consideration and the appeal to sectional feelings, to unfit him for that calm consideration necessary for the high discharge of his duty in this hour of excitement.

My people are in trouble, and it is within the power of the President to relieve them or to continue their unhappy condition. Every citizen of Alabama is in his limb, liberty, and property at the mercy of partisan officers and ignorant and packed juries. The fountains of national justice are broken up, and uncertainty and apprehension are not only sapping the energies of the people, but making many hearts bitter and desperate. In the Forty-fourth Congress the then leader of the other side of the House, now a member of the Senate, charged that the South was solid and in alliance with western democrats for the purpose of ruling the country. Now their present leader charges in the same place that we are solid in the treasonable design of destroying the Government by starvation. All the while, however, he insists that he is devoted to the South and desires above all things peace and reconciliation. His actions and his policy are not in accord with these protestations; and when I think of them I am reminded of Kemble's man in the Panel, when he exclaimed:

> Perhaps it is right to dissemble your love;
> But why do you wish to kick us down stairs?

Mr. Chairman, if the South is united it is not against the people of the North, nor against any class or race of men. We need help and sympathy too much for this. When the war closed there was never a people more divided in sentiment than those of my section. We have been brought together by necessity and united for the preservation of our property, our liberties, and our civilization; this union has been cemented by the miseries of an impoverished, long-suffering, a misrepresented, but a proud and liberty-loving people. We desire above all things to unite with the people of every section who love justice, liberty, and constitutional government in order to promote the peace, the happiness, and glory of our common country. If you want a strong government of the people it must come up voluntarily from them and rest evenly upon the shoulders of every section of this Union.

But if you mean to have a strong Government independent of and against one great section of this country, its strength must lie in the immensity of its revenues, the extent of its patronage, the use of corruption, the special protection of privileged classes, the overshadowing growth of monopolies, the gloss and glitter of a money aristocracy, the debasement of the masses, backed by standing armies and floating navies.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ATKINS. I yield the remainder of my hour to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SAMFORD.]

Mr. SAMFORD. Mr. Chairman, I was not one of the fortunate few who succeeded the other day in getting their names sufficiently high on the Speaker's list for any practicable purpose, in the undignified scramble rendered necessary by the rules of this House. Hence I am indebted, for the few minutes I shall occupy, to my distinguished friend from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] who has charge of this bill.

I am aware that the debate on the sections before the House is but a continuation of the debate on the Army bill. Indeed, when that bill was before the House these sections were discussed as largely as the measures which were then under consideration. I will be pardoned, then, for anticipating the line of argument which will be pursued now. It is a matter of regret that for party purposes it has been deemed wise by republican leaders to restir the fires of sectional strife which the good of the whole country require to be utterly extinguished. And when, a few weeks ago, on my entrance into this Hall, I heard on every side mutual expression of good-will and personal regard freely uttered toward political opponents, in the innocency of my nature I rejoiced that the era of peace and brotherly love had dawned in this House and that its rays would be shed over the whole country.

But soon the roseate reverie was dispelled, when the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] deliberately charged on this floor that the South was now signalizing her return to the Halls of Congress by an attempt to disrupt the Government by starving it to death. Following the same line, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] pretended to announce the real sentiment of the South by reading the wild utterances of a little paper in Mississippi, and with that as his text proceeded to fire the northern heart by unjust and cruel denunciation of a large section of the Union. If he had been willing to treat the southern democracy with candor, or even with harsh justice, he could have found in any southern journal of influence such expressions as I now read from a leading daily in Mobile, speaking of the extract he read:

> The democratic press of Mississippi, in common with that of the entire South, condemn the utterances of the Okolona States. The ultraism of that journal is generally attributed to the junior editor, Mr. Kernan, recently from Ohio; but the Brandon (Mississippi) Republican lays the responsibility on the chief editor. The Republican says it does not believe there are half a dozen sensible democrats in the State who approve his course during the past two months.

Such utterances from these prominent leaders of their party not only frosted the buds of fraternal feelings, but laid bare, "with a flash of light," that the key-note of republican warfare in 1880 would be a "crusade of vengeance" against the South. Now, Mr. Chairman, against the vengeful hate of such a policy I do not intend to-day to defend the South. "She needs no defense at my hands." While I love my section—while her hills and valleys, her glens and dales, her sons and daughters, her honor and renown, the name and fame of her heroes and statesmen are as dear to me as light and life—and while, as the waves of revolution beat upon that sunny shore, floating out the wrecks of many a homestead, my heart bled for every woe and tears fell on the graves since grown green, yet I am willing to send the South and her partisan accusers to that impartial history where all causes are weighed "in the exactest lines and balances of truth," and verdicts written with the iron pen of justice.

The persistent effort of republican leaders to drag southern members on this floor into crimination and recrimination as to the dead past, and thereby away from the real issues involved in the question, is a splendid piece of political strategy, in the execution of which, so far as I am concerned, they shall utterly fail. No, gentlemen, you may fire away your blank cartridges in your side-skirmishing, I shall stand on the line of battle encircling the great rights involved in this controversy, and from it you shall neither drive us by threats nor lure us by artifice.

What is the issue? It is simply this: we propose to pass a bill appropriating many millions of dollars for the support of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the Government for one year, with amendments thereto providing for the repeal of the statute requiring a test oath of jurors in the Federal courts, and also of that Federal statute providing for innumerable Federal supervisors, marshals, and deputy marshals at the polls during an election for Federal officers.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] admits that this House and the Senate may constitutionally and legally pass these repealing amendments attached to this bill, and no one denies this right. But he says the attempt to have the President approve the bill or by vetoing it stop the supplies of the Government is an attempt to coerce the Executive, thereby destroying his "free consent" to the repeal of those laws, and therefore the attempt is "revolution." Coming in this method, says he, while their repeal as independent propositions may be simply a "chip" on the shoulder of the minority, yet the republican minority will fight for that "chip" as if it were a "kohinoor of the first water;" or, in other words, that the minority will not surrender that worthless chip even to save the Government from starving.

Whether the President will yield to the demand of the "stalwarts" of his party and veto this bill, or what will be the duty of the majority in that event, I shall not now discuss. But if he should, and the majority of this House should be of opinion that the great rights of freemen demand that this bill should never pass without those amendments and the Government should be left without supplies for lack of two-thirds to pass it over the veto, at whose door would the fault lie? At the door of the majority conscientiously contending for principle, or at the door of a minority, consenting to the starvation of the Government rather than yield a "chip?"

I refrain, for lack of time, from discussing the reason why the purse was placed in our system in the hands of the people's Representatives. That has already been elaborated in the progress of this debate.

Even if the charge be true that this method was adopted to obtain the consent of an unfriendly President, it does not lie in the mouth of the republican party to bring the charge. Time and again during the dark reign of that party in these Halls such legislation has been enacted by attachment to money bills. The very law we are now attempting to repeal was attached to an appropriation bill, and we have to dig it up from its hiding place in the depths of such a measure to put it on trial again.

Ah, but gentlemen say, that violated no "free consent" of the Executive, because if he had vetoed it there were more than two-thirds of each House republicans. That may be so as to this occasion; but you passed just such an amendment in 1867 to the Army bill, and by that amendment you struck down the President, Mr. Johnson, from his position as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, where the Constitution had placed him, and substituted General Grant in his stead. At that time President Johnson refused to be a supple tool in the hands of a lawless Congress, and for that reason by that amendment he was coerced into approving the Army appropriation bill containing his own degradation, or let the Army starve, and he so stated in effect in his message, and entered his protest against it; and though you then had two-thirds in Congress, yet upon a motion to strike out that obnoxious amendment there were 62 yeas and 69 nays. There were conservative republicans who would not have sustained you in passing the bill over his veto, and you knew it, and so you coerced the President, and now you presume to shriek "revolution" in our ears for passing a measure which you do not even know that the President will not approve. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was a member of Congress then, and instead of thundering "revolution" in the ears of his own party then he was as soft as a cooing dove. When that partisan outrage was being perpetrated he did not even vote on the motion to strike out the section. Then as now he evaded the great question at issue.

But I do not ask for precedent for this legislation. The real question is, Is it constitutional and legal to thus legislate by this House? That is conceded by all. Then, is it right to repeal these laws? To attempt to elaborate or even to discuss all the points involved in these amendments, covering as they do many sections of the Revised Statutes, would require far more time than I have at my command. The jurors' test-oath clause has heretofore been repealed by a republican Congress, and by President Grant allowed to become a law, and is now in the statutes by mistake; and I apprehend no one will object to its repeal, and for that reason I shall confine myself to what is known as the "supervisor and marshal" feature.

I am not vain enough to believe that what I shall say will have any consideration from, much less effect upon, any partisan within sound of my voice. It is to be lamented that within these Halls party ascendency is more esteemed, as a rule, than the welfare of country. The din of party warfare drowns all other sounds in this Chamber.

Notwithstanding these things, as long as I have a seat in this body I shall embrace every occasion to reassert for the people and the States the right which they have never surrendered to the Federal Government—the right of local government as essential to guard intact individual freedom and to protect the citizen from the heavy hand of Federal oppression.

DELEGATED POWERS.

Now, sir, suppose this law is contrary to the Constitution; contrary to the clear spirit, if not the letter, of that instrument we have sworn to support. What then? Will any man dare to say that it is "revolution" to repeal such a law in any lawful manner? I imagine not.

Well, let us see. It is admitted by all parties that the Federal Government has only delegated powers, and all others are retained by the people. Indeed this principle is expressly announced in the Constitution itself. But the people have in all their State constitutions intrusted State Legislatures with the regulation of elections. Therefore we may say all powers over elections not delegated to Congress in the Constitution are reserved to State Legislatures. These powers are not only delegated, but, in the expressive language of Mr. Hamilton, they are "few and defined," who, in another place concedes that the Federal Government is an "agent or trustee" to exercise grants for the benefit of the people. It was never intended that this governmental agent should argue unto itself an enlargement of the original powers, but should be confined to the purposes specifically named in its commission. Neither does the appointment or creation of this agent for certain purposes authorize its assumption to act in any other manner for the fulfillment of such objects than in that mode specifically prescribed.

It is true the power to act is implied and the means to be employed necessarily within the discretion of the Government when a duty is prescribed and no particular mode designated. But in other cases, where not only the power but the manner of its execution are both defined, then to depart from either is equally usurpation and unwarranted assumption of power. And even when implication must be indulged, such only should be as is absolutely essential to the accomplishment of a pronounced duty.

It would be monstrous to say that the Federal Government may move in a different sphere, or in a different orbit in that sphere, than that ordained by the people when they, at the hands of the States, fashioned its form and prescribed its course. To do either would equally violate the end of its creation and be a dangerous infraction of the great rights of civil liberty.

LITERAL CONSTRUCTION.

Again, in construing Federal powers a liberal construction should obtain in favor of the power granting authority, and a literal construction in favor of the reception of power. For the unanimous verdict of history is, that power unrestrained sooner or later develops into arbitrary despotism.

BY THESE RULES CONGRESSIONAL POWER CONSIDERED.

If, then, the only power of Congress over Federal elections in the States must be found in the Constitution, and if the means of its exercise is also therein prescribed, and if both should receive that construction which is restrictive of congressional action, by which I mean a fair, honest, and reasonable construction, then I ask what is the extent of congressional power to interfere in elections?

The section reads:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to places of choosing Senators.

The language is, the Legislatures "shall" prescribe the "times, places and manners" of holding elections.

Is this duty imposed on State Legislatures, with the power in Congress to capriciously alter or annul their action? If so, then it is simply to relieve Congress of the burden of this legislation, and is to be exercised by permission of Congress. But instead of its being a permissive grant to the States, it is a mandate of the Constitution that this power "shall be" exercised by them.

If it is permissive to the States, then their Legislatures may or may not prescribe "the times, places, and manner of holding elections." If that is so, State legislators do not violate the Constitution of the United States if they exercise their option and fail to make such provision. The mere statement of this proposition carries its own refutation.

THE CONSTRUCTION OF CENTRALIZATION.

If the construction contended for be true that the Legislatures may act in this matter by permission of Congress, or only when Congress fails or prefers not to exercise the power, then why were these words, "the times, places, and manner of holding elections shall be prescribed by the Legislatures of States," inserted in the section at all? If it is true they have jurisdiction only in the absence of congressional action these words are absolutely nugatory and meaningless, because if the space they occupy were a perfect blank the State Legislatures would still have that right. The Constitution gives the power to Congress to regulate commerce, and nowhere says State Legislatures may take cognizance of that subject. And yet the Supreme Court has held that in the absence of congressional regulation of commerce the States may do so. Hence, if the States would have the power to regulate these elections without special permission, what is the force of the mandatory words in the section if it is not that such elections shall be regulated by the State Legislatures, and if they fail to act then the Congress "may make" them?

FOR SELF-PRESERVATION THE POWER GRANTED.

That the Legislatures must first make the regulations; if they fail or refuse, then the Congress for the preservation of the Government may make such regulations, and having made may alter, (or if we concede to alter means to "alter" State regulations, then it is only when such regulations are inimical to a republican form of government, when Congress alters by virtue of another constitutional grant,) is a construction which gives effect to every word in the clause. Therefore I contend this power was vested in Congress to be used in the last resort for the preservation of the Union.

THE POWERS NOT CONCURRENT.

I am aware, in assuming this advanced position, I deny concessions which have been made by friends on this side of the Chamber, in whose legal ability I have great confidence, and hence I have sought impregnable authority before yielding consent to this conclusion.

This power of Congress over such elections is not in esse but in posse; a dormant power which awakes only upon the condition the States fail, and the permission is to Congress—"the Congress may"—when the States shall by their own conduct invoke the necessity.

It is not concurrent with the powers of the States. This power cannot possibly in natura rerum be exercised by both the State and Congress at the same time. If one acts the whole ground is covered. If both must act, which shall do so first—if obligatory on both there must be conflict—the one which shall prescribe, or that one which "may make or alter?" Mr. Hamilton answers: "The power is primarily in the States." If so, may the Congress capriciously, or in its own judgment, make other provisions or alter those already made by State Legislatures? If so, why was not the whole matter intrusted to Congress at once?

RULES OF CONSTRUCTION.

To intelligently construe an ambiguous constitutional or statutory law it is not only permissible, but sometimes necessary, to "turn on the lights" of both contemporaneous history and contemporaneous expression of the law-maker. What was the evil which contemporaneous history teaches was sought to be guarded against? The States were all-powerful and aggressive toward and jealous of the Federal Government and disposed to jeopardize the stability of the Union. And subsequent history has demonstrated the wisdom of that jealousy in the almost imperial consolidation of all power in the hands of Federal authority.

Expressions of Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Madison, stanch advocates of the Constitution, when urging its ratification sustain the conclusion that the evil apprehended was the disintegration of the Government.

Mr. Hamilton's language is:

It will always be far more easy for the State governments to encroach upon the national authority than for the National Government to encroach upon the State authority.

Again, Mr. Madison says:

Each of the principal branches of the Federal Government will * * * feel a dependence on the State governments, which is much more likely to beget a disposition too obsequious than too overbearing toward them.

Thus we see the apprehension of the Constitution framers was that the principle of preservation was essential to a desirable government, and hence for that purpose alone it was given to the Congress to "make or alter such regulations" ultimately. It was not necessary for this purpose that it should be primarily lodged in Congress, and hence it was determined to place this important power, as I have said before, in the language of Hamilton—

Primarily in the State Legislatures and ultimately in the National Legislature.

It is a noticeable and pregnant fact, Mr. Chairman, that nearly every State convention, while considering the Constitution when it was on trial for ratification, not only hesitated but absolutely staggered in the presence of this section, and hesitated to grant this power even ultimately to the Congress, as if by intuition if not inspiration our fathers foresaw the danger therein contained to the gem of civil liberty which they were seeking to transmit undimmed to their children forever. In Virginia and North Carolina and various other State conventions the debates were exhaustive, and all in line with my assertion.

In the Massachusetts convention Mr. Strong, who was strenuously insisting on the ratification of the Constitution, used the following convincing language, which I read:

If the legislative bodies of the States, who must be supposed to know at what time and in what place and in what manner the elections can best be held, should so appoint them, it cannot be supposed that Congress by the power granted by this section will alter them; but if a Legislature of a State should refuse to make such regulations, the consequence will be that the General Government will be dissolved.

And from this last fact and under such circumstances he argues the necessity of placing this power in Congress in the last resort.

In the same convention, after exhaustive discussion participated in by John Hancock, Samuel Adams, John Winthrop, Rufus King, Christopher Gore, and such men, this section was sustained alone on the grounds—I read from the debates:

1. As it may be used to correct a negligence in elections.
2. As it will prevent the dissolution of the Government by designing and refractory States.
3. As it will operate as a check in favor of the people against designs of the Federal Senate and their constituents, the State Legislatures, to deprive the people of their right of election.
4. As it provides a remedy for the evils, should any State, by invasion or other cause, not have it in its power to appoint a place to elect Federal Representatives.

That the Congress might act regardless of State action was no where contended for, or that the State Legislatures should act by congressional permission.

But to quiet apprehensions of those who feared a contrary construction, it was decided in the several conventions to ratify the Constitution, accompanied with a resolution asking for an amendment making plain the construction its friends admitted to be the true one.

The resolution of the Massachusetts convention was:

That Congress do not exercise the powers vested in it by the fourth section of the first article but in cases when a State shall neglect or refuse to make the regulations therein mentioned, or shall make regulations subversive of the rights of the people to a free and equal representation in Congress, agreeably to the Constitution.

To quiet the same apprehensions, New York went further in its idea of the proper restraints to be offered as an amendment. In answer to which resolution Mr. Jay (without objecting to the resolution) said of the section as it stood—

That every government was imperfect unless it had a power of preserving itself. Suppose that by design or accident the States should neglect to appoint representatives, certainly there should be some constitutional remedy for this evil. The obvious meaning—

Now mark his words—

The obvious meaning of the paragraph is that if this neglect should take place Congress should have the power by law to support the Government and prevent the dissolution of the Union. I believe this was the design of the Federal convention.

These are convincing words from Mr. Jay. And by this light flamed by Mr. Jay's own hand, streaming down the corridors of the century, I ask the centralizers of power to read this section.

And yet in the face of all these apprehensions and assurances from the wise men of the past who framed the Constitution; in view of the recent alarming strides of Federal centralization toward absolute power; in full view of Federal judges dragging the ermine through political mire to partisan support; in the light of citizens shackled and dragged away from the polls—States dismantled, and the stamp of soldiery still ringing along the halls of State capitols, attuning legislation to martial airs, the astounding utterence startled us in this Hall two days ago, from a southern republican member, that he hoped Congress would take entire control and charge of these elections.

Ah! that is it. That is the objective point of all this legislation and the consummation at which the republican party aims; and there is just the difference between the two great parties in this land.

But to return from this digression. If these historical facts and expressions, contemporaneous with the enactment of a law, furnish any light by which to read its meaning, we are bound to conclude that if the Legislatures of the States have already prescribed the times, places, and manner of holding these elections, and such regulations are consistent with a republican form of government, (and no one gainsays this,) then the Congress has no right or power to act at all.

If this is true, and Congress has nevertheless usurped the functions of State Legislatures by intermeddling, then instead of its being "revolution" to repeal such laws, it is the highest duty of statesmanship to utterly refuse to grant one dollar to execute them.

IN ANY EVENT THE POWER ABUSED.

Again, even if I am in error, and Congress has the power I have denied, still the utmost of its jurisdiction is to "make or alter such regulations." But the appointment of supervisors, marshals, and their deputies, is in no sense, making or altering "the times, places, or manner." They cannot be said to be necessary to the "manner," because the whole manner is complete, and has been for years, without their interposition.

As illustrated forcibly by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GIBSON,] Congress has the same power over the "manner" of selecting Senators that it has over the election of Representatives. May Congress order supervisors and marshals to place their unhallowed foot in State legislative halls and scrutinize the election of Senators, and arrest "without warrant" any legislator whom they may imagine to be violating the law? And yet this is their power at the polls. And if they may be at one place, they may plant themselves at the other.

STATE LAWS ENFORCED.

But, Mr. Chairman, Federal courts have no common-law jurisdiction of crimes. The penal code of which they have jurisdiction is purely artificial, created by acts of Congress. And yet these supervisors and marshals are Federal officers charged with the punishment of offenders against State law. It is an attempt by Congress to enforce State laws and to compel managers of elections, appointees of the State, to execute State laws under heavy and harsh penalties, and make these "Federal kuklux" the absolute judges of their violation, with the power to arrest "with or without warrant" and drag an unoffending citizen, may be, to a distant court to be tried by a partisan judge and a jury organized to convict.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with barely time to state, less to argue, and still less to illustrate, the constitutional view against these statutes, I conclude that this fabric of constitutional government, reared by the wisdom of men who were devotees at the shrine of liberty, will be shaken from its granite foundation if we fail to resist the insidious approaches of its implacable enemy, the demon of national centralization.

ARE THESE PROVISIONS EXPEDIENT?

Suppose I grant all that the most pronounced federalist may claim, still these laws are not only inexpedient and unnecessary, but they are wicked, cruel, subversive of free elections, and destructive of civil liberty. Their practical workings have been to vex, harass, overawe, and intimidate the citizen; and by the profligate use of money drawn from the Public Treasury hundreds of these Federal minions have swarmed through the land as special advocates of the party in power. Together with Federal postmasters and officials they constitute a well-disciplined, compact organization, paid by the Government and backed by the Army and Navy, championing the cause of the republican party. Clothed with all the paraphernalia of absolute power, they laugh to scorn the rights of unarmed citizens. Cæsar with his legions never threatened Gaul with surer devastation than these legions of a corrupt party the liberties of this land. And wherever the margin of majorities is small the will of the people has been and will be again silenced in death by the machinery of this vicious law.

NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA.

Recent exposures of its practical results in New York and Philadelphia, at which the country stands aghast, demonstrate the perfidious practices which are its legitimate progeny.

If the time has arrived in this country that the citizen cannot be depended on to protect the purity of the ballot unaided by Federal "overseers," then no law can maintain his liberty. If it is necessary to protect by Federal interference the citizen against his own fraud, then the book had as well be closed, the last chapter of individual liberty has been written, the experiment of self-government has lamentably failed, and freedom's sun barely hangs above the western horizon ere it sinks forever and leaves the world to darkness and despotism.

CONCLUSION.

I have not the time to read, much less analyze, the wickedness embraced in these highly penal laws. My time is exhausted, and the half has not been told.

By just such means as these the republican party has been enabled to keep its unholy grip on power. Its terrible struggle to retain these laws is a dying clutch for power still, slipping away, I trust forever, from a party that has used it to grind the many for the benefit of the few; that has used it to create moneyed lords in this land, lacking only the title, but with all the grinding power of eastern aristocrats; that has used it to unsettle the foundation principles of civil liberty, and to override, trample down, and stamp out law and order whenever they opposed barriers to its own aggrandizement.

As to the veto which has been so flippantly threatened, as I said before, I shall not discuss that; because we have no right to presume the President will do what we believe to be wrong. If he does, then will be the time, and not now, to take such action as is becoming to the Representatives of a people determined to remain free. To them in the last resort we go and submit this great question, and when they fully comprehend the fact that the republican party strained every effort to perpetuate a law aimed at the destruction of the corner-stone of civil liberty, they will speak, not in "the still small voice" of plaintive appeal but in the torrent's thunders when the "gates are uplifted" and "fine grinding" has commenced.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 17, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 55) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the purchase or construction of a refrigerating ship for the disinfection of vessels and cargoes, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) relating to the organization of the National Board of Health.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 7th instant, a report of the Quartermaster-General and accompanying papers in relation to discriminations made by the Union Pacific Railroad Company in favor of private shippers as against the United States; which, on motion of Mr. FERRY, were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL subsequently said: The communication from the Secretary of War in answer to a resolution submitted by me, with the report of the Quartermaster-General, and the papers connected therewith, should be printed and for the present laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order has been made.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WALLACE, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 19) to provide for the publication and distribution of a supplement to the Revised Statutes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON TRANSIT OF VENUS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred a concurrent resolution to print additional copies of the report of the observation of the transit of Venus, has instructed me to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 250 additional copies of the observations of the transit of Venus made under the direction of the Navy Department, in December, 1874, be printed for the use of the Naval Observatory.

SALARIES OF SENATE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I report back the following resolution referred by the Senate to the Committee on Contingent Expenses, with the recommendation that it pass. I ask that it be acted on now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution submitted by Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, March 26:

Resolved, That the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate be, and the same is hereby, directed to take into consideration, with the view to economy and the equalization of salaries upon the principles of justice, the question of the duties, number, and compensation of the employés of the Senate, and to report thereon by bill or otherwise; said committee to have leave to sit during the recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr HOAR. I should like to have it lie over until to-morrow. I presume there will be no sort of objection to it, but there may be a subject that I should like to move to add to it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Of course the Senator has a right to have the resolution lie over; but circumstances will prevent me from being present to-morrow. The resolution was offered by myself and sent to the committee and considered by them. It simply gives the committee the power to revise the salaries of the Senate employés with a view to economy, and submit any report they may make to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. My suggestion was that it might be desirable to extend a little the inquiry; but if the Senator is not to be present to-morrow, I shall not insist upon the delay.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the Senator wishes it to lie over that he may see the wording of the resolution, I have no objection.

Mr. HOAR. Let it pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being objection, the resolution goes over.

Mr. HOAR. I will waive the objection. The Senator from West Virginia says he will not be present to-morrow, and I shall not, therefore, insist upon the postponement of the resolution. As it is convenient to him I will waive the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the resolution is before the Senate.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 443) regulating the appointment of United States marshals; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GROVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 444) for the construction of a custom-house and bonded warehouse at Portland, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WITHERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 22) in re claim of William B. Isaacs & Co.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ATLAS SHEETS OF GEOGRAPHICAL SURVEYS.

Mr. GROOME submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House concurring therein,) That there shall be printed as issued 5,000 copies of each of the quarto reports and accompanying topographical and geological atlas sheets of the United States Geographical Surveys West of the One Hundredth Meridian, under the Engineer Bureau of the War Department, and in charge of First Lieutenant George M. Wheeler, Corps of Engineers; 3,000 copies for the House of Representatives, 1,000 copies for the Senate, and 1,000 copies for the use of the War Department; the printing from the stereotype plates and binding to be done by the Government Printer, and the style of the text, together with the accompanying plates, maps, and atlas sheets, to correspond with those now printed, the latter from proof corrected and approved at the office of the United States topographical surveys.

APPOINTMENT AND REMOVAL OF SENATE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. WALLACE. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the standing order of the Senate regulating the appointment and removal of clerks and other employés of the Senate be, and it is hereby, amended by striking out of the same all after the word "respectively" in the third line, so that the same shall read as follows:

"Resolved, That the several officers and others in the departments of the Secretary of the Senate and of the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be appointed and removed from office by those officers respectively."

Mr. ANTHONY. Let that lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution lies over until to-morrow.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. HAMLIN. I renew the request which I made a day or two since that the Senate will excuse me from serving upon the select committee to consider claims against the government of Nicaragua.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that that request will not be granted this morning. I desire to confer with the Senator myself before his request is acted upon. I desire it to go over for the present at any rate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I made the request once before. Let it be granted now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion can only be considered now, by unanimous consent, during the morning hour.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is hardly in the nature of a motion; it is a request made to the Senate. I made it the other day. I said I should renew the request, and I hope the Senator from Vermont will not interpose any objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to see the Senator myself before it is acted upon. It can come up again in the course of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the motion of the Senator from Maine that he be excused from further service on the committee he has named?

Mr. MORRILL. I hope it will not be acted upon this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair considers that an objection, and the motion will go over until to-morrow.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no concurrent or other resolutions, the morning hour has expired. There being no resolutions on the Calendar except the two that have been laid on the table by order of the Senate, the Chair calls up the regular order, which is the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, the pending question upon which is the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] On that question the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, when I took the floor yesterday I did not observe that my friend from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] had risen at the same time for the purpose of entering upon the discussion of this bill. If I had been advised of his desire to speak this morning, I certainly should at that moment have deferred to him. I think it is my duty, or rather, I feel that it is my privilege, to so defer to him this morning. It is particularly appropriate that I should do so for the reason that the debate on this measure up to this point of time, in all of its political phases, has been by gentlemen who live either in the border or in the Northern States. No one from any of the lately rebellious States has participated to any extent in the debate upon its political aspect.

The South has been frequently referred to, oftentimes with great severity and almost always in a spirit of complaining, during the debate. While I have felt wounded that the debate should unnecessarily have taken such a direction, I intended when I took the floor, and I intend when I shall hereafter take the floor, to enter upon some vindication of the South in reference to its course upon all legislation since the termination of the war. This would be entirely unnecessary and entirely incompatible with our tastes if it were not that every question which comes before the Senate of the United States that seems to have any political bearing in it is tried, illustrated, and determined by the supposed interest that the Southern States may feel in it.

The particular measure which is under discussion now, or rather the particular feature of the sixth section of this bill which is under discussion, the repeal of so much of the existing law as authorizes the keeping of the military at the election polls, is not a measure which was suggested or brought forward in this body or the other House by a southern man. During the last session of Congress Mr. Southard, of Ohio, of the House of Representatives, brought this measure forward. Mr. Southard is recognized throughout the United States as being a distinguished democrat, as being also, I think, an able constitutional lawyer. The presentation by a democrat from Ohio of this question has not so far at least in the Senate excited any debate on the part of southern men, and it might even have passed to a final vote without having required from us any vindication of the South or any expression of our views upon the question if it had not been that all the sins which we are supposed to have committed in the past are brought to the attention of the country, and whether we have had any connection with the bringing of this measure forward or not these imputed sins are laid to the charge of this measure and are made to add their weight to obstruct its progress.

I desire, therefore, that this argument shall proceed as far as it possibly can without this incumbrance, for this I recognize as a great question of constitutional law and also a great question concerning the liberties of the people of the United States; not those now living merely, but those to exist hereafter. I look upon the struggle that is now entered upon in the Senate and House of Representatives as one the final determination of which will solve the question whether a standing army is to become one of the permanent constitutional departments of this Government, beyond the power of Congress to control its use or to direct the extent of its being supplied whenever in the judgment of the people that standing army ought not to be used for certain purposes or ought not to be kept to a certain standard of strength, and when in the judgment of the country its military defense, the regulation of its social order, the preservation of its peace, if need be, ought to be confided to its militia.

I desire that this question shall as far as possible be argued without reference to the history of the Southern States from 1861 up to the present time. It has not been our fault that this embarrassment has been thrown upon this debate, and it shall not be my fault as a representative of a Southern State if, by appearing in the debate at this moment of time, there shall be any occasion for the other side of the Senate to charge upon us that this legislation has a more distinct and direct reference to our present and future than to any other section of the United States. We believe that we stand in the United States entitled to all the constitutional rights and privileges of any other class of people; that our States are entitled to as much respect as any of the States; that their voice in the counsels of the country ought to be heard with as much good-will and ought to receive as much frank and honest and sincere attention as the voice of any other States in any other part of the American Union. We would like to go further, and would be glad to feel that notwithstanding all the distrust that Senators on the other side of the Chamber seem disposed to exhibit toward us, they will at last be willing to meet us in a better spirit of frank cordiality in the discussion of all great questions concerning the Constitution and the welfare of the people of the United States.

Therefore, Mr. President, I will do myself and the Senate also the pleasure of withdrawing from this debate at the present moment and yield to my friend from Indiana. I will, however, at some future occasion during the debate undertake to express my views upon this question. In doing so it will be my pleasure to follow any gentleman on the other side who may desire to participate in the debate, if there are any who do so desire.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I desire first to tender to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] my very sincere thanks and my profound sense of gratitude for the courtesy that he has extended to me on this occasion.

Mr. President, it is due to the American people that a clear and ample statement should be made of the causes which have led to the present extra session of Congress. I propose, therefore, to examine in detail the laws of the United States as they now exist on the two great questions of popular elections and impartial courts, and to show that if these laws are permitted to remain in force it will only be necessary for some bold man, clothed with executive authority, to put them in active operation in order, at his own pleasure, to overthrow this Republic in spirit, form, and name from its turrets to its foundation-stones. I propose to demonstrate that all the parts of a complete and systematic machinery for a successful revolution against every principle of free government, against every reserved right of the States, and against the most hallowed safeguards of individual liberty are to be found in the malign legislation of the last fourteen years. Let the laws themselves speak, and when their ominous and threatening voices are fully heard throughout the land I am willing to stand or fall by the candid judgment of the people.

Sir, I cite, to begin with, section 5506 of the Revised Statutes, chapter 7 of the title "crimes," as the keystone to the whole arch of Federal usurpation over the freedom of the ballot-box. I do not believe it is generally known that the Federal Government has asserted to itself the right by law to interfere with and control all the elections of every description throughout the Union. On the contrary, the prevalent opinion, I think, has been that this tremendous power was only claimed and exercised at times and places when and where Federal officials such as Members and Delegates in Congress were chosen by the people. The section, however, cited reads as follows:

Every person who, by any unlawful means, hinders, delays, prevents, or obstructs, or combines and confederates with others to hinder, delay, prevent, or obstruct, any citizen from doing any act required to be done to qualify him to vote, or from voting at any election in any State, Territory, district, county, city, parish, township, school district, municipality, or other territorial subdivision, shall be fined not less than $500, or be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than one year, or be punished by both such fine and imprisonment.

Can the human mind conceive an election of any kind in all this broad land which is not reached and embraced in these sweeping provisions? All the States and Territories are here invaded and their right to regulate their own elections and to punish those who offend against their freedom and purity is broken down. Wherever also a county or a parish is engaged in choosing their clerks, auditors, treasurers, and sheriffs, wherever a city proceeds to elect her mayor and other municipal officers, or a township or a school district is voting for their constables and trustees, there the presence of United States authority to arrest, fine, and imprison is asserted and secured by this law. If in the excitement of election day two citizens quarrel, and one hinders, delays, or obstructs the other from reaching the polls as soon as he otherwise might, a fine of not less than $500 is here denounced against the offender, to which may be added an imprisonment of one year. This is the plain reading of this enactment, and I challenge contradiction. But it may be said that this section does not provide for its own execution, and therefore it can never become destructive to the liberties and local rights of the people. No such oversight, however, occurred on the part of those who devised this legislation. The most ample provisions have been made for its rigid enforcement in every nook and corner of the Union. Section 1982 contains the following peremptory command to Federal officials everywhere:

The district attorneys, marshals, and deputy marshals, the commissioners appointed by the circuit and territorial courts, with power to arrest, imprison, or bail offenders, and every other officer who is especially empowered by the President, are authorized and required, at the expense of the United States, to institute prosecutions against all persons violating any of the provisions of chapter 7 of the title "crimes," and to cause such persons to be arrested, and imprisoned or bailed, for trial before the court of the United States or the territorial court having cognizance of the offense.

Here it will be seen that the entire executive force of all the United States courts, backed by the money of the United States Treasury, is dedicated to the enforcement of all the provisions of chapter 7 of the title "crimes," including, of course, section 5506, heretofore quoted. Section 5506, however, simply stands at the head of a chapter of crimes such as were never before known to American law; a chapter of twenty-seven elaborate sections, in twenty-three of which the fiery and unscrupulous zeal of party hate and the refined ingenuity of trained lawyers have exhausted themselves in creating new offenses against the elective franchise, in digging pitfalls and weaving snares for the unwary feet of plain and honest citizens, in prescribing the ready instrumentalities by which they may be overtaken in seeming violations of law, in dragging them suddenly away from among their neighbors to distant hostile Federal courts for trial, and in denouncing against them such penalties, after conviction by packed juries, as would warm the dust of Scroggs and Jeffries with joy could they hear them, though they have lain two centuries dead.

Sir, this chapter has no parallel among the penal codes of civilized nations. If two persons conspire to threaten any citizen in the enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having exercised such right or privilege, they are liable, under section 5508, to a fine of $5,000, and to imprisonment for a term of ten years, although the threat may not have been carried out or its execution even attempted. If some timid or malicious partisan can satisfy a jury of his own politics, and a biased court, that two or more persons have agreed among themselves to intimidate him in the free exercise and enjoyment of his rights, he will secure their conviction and their punishment by enormous fines and long imprisonment, although in fact he may not have been intimidated or scared at all or injured in any respect whatever. And to this penalty shall be added ineligibility to any office or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States. This is the very barbarism of party warfare and has its origin in the most vindictive passions of the human heart.

Penal codes for the purpose of securing and maintaining party ascendency are familiar to the historian of every age, but none have been more malignant than this. Bearing this fact in mind I ask the attention of the Senate next to another branch of this general system for the suppression of free elections. It bears to the other parts of the system a close and vital connection. The Federal Government having usurped full and complete authority over every species of elections, State, county, township, and city, and having given this usurpation in charge to the Federal courts and their officials, to execute, an omnipresent detective corps, clothed with unlimited powers over the ballot-box and over the liberties of the voter, was next generated and called into existence by evil and rancorous legislation. It is held by some that noxious vermin and poisonous reptiles have their origin in the corruptions of nature.

Be that as it may, I come now to deal with a class of Federal officials who have been spawned upon the country through the degenerating processes of party animosity, and who are more offensive to American freemen than anything, however loathsome or dangerous, to which they may be likened in the animal kingdom. Supervisors of elections! The dictionaries call them overseers. Overseers of elections! A most apt and truthful definition when their duties are considered! The American people going to the polls and voting under overseers would indeed be a nation of slaves, and if they submit to do so they will deserve their fate. Let us examine the sources whence these overseers come, and let us inspect the long and cruel lash of their unbridled powers. By virtue of section 2011 of the Revised Statutes any two citizens of any city or town having upward of twenty thousand inhabitants, or any ten citizens of any county or parish of any congressional district in the United States who may, from any motives however sinister, desire to have a registration of voters or an election "guarded and scrutinized," are empowered to open and to keep open the circuit court of the United States wherein such city or town, county or parish is situated, and there begin their work. The next five sections point out the methods by which the hand of the judge and the seal of the court are used in manufacturing supervisors of elections. A chief of this band of intruders upon the rights of freemen is also provided for in section 2025, as follows:

The circuit courts of the United States for each judicial circuit shall name and appoint, on or before the 1st day of May, in the year 1871, and thereafter as vacancies may from any cause arise, from among the circuit court commissioners for each judicial district in each judicial circuit, one of such officers, who shall be known for the duties required of him under this title as the chief supervisor of elections of the judicial district for which he is a commissioner, and shall, so long as faithful and capable, discharge the duties in this title imposed.

The supervising force, being organized and stationed at every precinct where the people vote for a member or delegate in Congress, and its chiefs, its generals of departments being appointed and placed in command, we are next to examine and ascertain how completely the ballot-box is torn from the hands of the local authorities and given over to the clutches of Federal officials. In States which have registration laws the supervisors of elections, or overseers as Webster defines them, by virtue of section 2016, take absolute control of the whole subject, making the lists to suit themselves, putting on or striking off names or marking them for challenge, as they please. The American citizen must find favor in the sight of his overseer, or his name will not appear on the list of voters on election day. While such an enactment as this is in existence the State which adopts a registration law makes a practical surrender of the control of its elections to the officers of the Federal Government. It is the election itself, however, that calls forth all the powers of the overseers in their most repulsive and dangerous light. In being authorized to control elections for Representatives and Delegates in Congress they have the entire control of the ballot for all other officers, State, county, and municipal, who are candidates at the same time and place and on the same ticket. Let us analyze section 2017. It reads as follows:

The supervisors of elections are authorized and required to attend at all times and places for holding elections of Representatives or Delegates in Congress, and for counting the votes cast at such elections; to challenge any vote offered by any person whose legal qualifications the supervisors, or either of them, may doubt; to be and remain where the ballot-boxes are kept at all times after the polls are open until every vote cast at such time and place has been counted, the canvass of all votes polled wholly completed, and the proper and requisite certificates or returns made, whether the certificates or returns be required under any law of the United States, or any State, territorial, or municipal law, and to personally inspect and scrutinize, from time to time, and at all times, on the day of election, the manner in which the voting is done, and the way and method in which the poll-books, registry-lists, and tallies, or check-books, whether the same are required by any law of the United States, or any State, territorial, or municipal law, are kept.

The duties here prescribed are mainly those of a spy, a spy upon the people as they come together at every voting precinct in the United States. The spirit which dictated this law was one of total distrust of the American people; a distrust of their virtue and their intelligence, of their capacity for self-government through the instrumentality of free elections. What a spectacle is here presented! The Federal Government furnishing officers to stand at all the polls "to challenge any vote offered by any person whose legal qualifications" may be doubted by them, as if the people of the different localities could not be trusted to choose their own challengers! These officials are also charged to keep watch and guard, with unceasing vigilance, over all the ballot-boxes, to be and remain with them all the time, "and to personally inspect and scrutinize from time to time and at all times the manner in which" the American citizen exercises his dearest right and most sacred privilege. This whole enactment proceeds upon the assumption that the officers of elections under State authority are predetermined felons, ballot-box thieves, forgers, and the like, and that the local communities which select them are accessory to their villainies. On this false and scandalous pretext the Federal authority has been made to overthrow the most vital and cherished principles of local self-government. The entire theory of the Constitution has been subverted. A centralization of power in the hands of the Federal Government over the local rights of the people and the States has been consummated which would have startled Alexander Hamilton in his day, although he believed in a monarchy. The judges and inspectors of elections acting under State laws are not permitted even to count out the ballots that have been cast by their neighbors. Section 2018 provides that:

The supervisors of election are, and each of them is, required to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district or voting precinct cast, whatever may be the indorsement on the ballot, or in whatever box it may have been placed or be found.

I call upon the thoughtful and just men of all parties everywhere to take note of this provision, and to make answer whether in their judgment the election boards of the States, holding State, county, township, and city elections, are unfit to count and canvass the votes they have received. Have the people consented to such an unspeakable degradation as this? Have they in fact become slaves in spirit, and willing to receive the yoke of their overseers? Sir, I do not believe it. On the contrary, I believe that the minds and hearts of a brave people, in love with liberty, will kindle in fierce indignation against such insulting tyranny when the whole subject is fairly placed before them.

The ingredients in this cup of humiliation and shame grow worse, however, if possible, as we proceed. Who can read the next section, section 2019, without a righteous sense of resistance springing up in his breast? Hear it:

The better to enable the supervisors of election to discharge their duties, they are authorized and directed, in their respective election districts or voting precincts, on the day of registration, on the day when registered voters may be marked to be challenged, and on the day of election, to take, occupy, and remain in such position, from time to time, whether before or behind the ballot-boxes, as will, in their judgment, best enable them to see each person offering himself for registration or offering to vote, and as will best conduce to their scrutinizing the manner in which the registration or voting is being conducted; and at the closing of the polls for the reception of votes, they are required to place themselves in such position, in relation to the ballot-boxes, for the purpose of engaging in the work of canvassing the ballots, as will enable them to fully perform the duties in respect to such canvass provided herein, and shall there remain until every duty in respect to such canvass, certificates, returns, and statements has been wholly completed.

Here at last we behold the citadel of free government stormed and taken. The enemy is placed by these provisions inside of that sacred bulwark of freedom for whose erection and defense the best blood of the world has streamed in torrents on the battle-field and under the dripping ax of the executioner. With the supervisors, as they take possession of the polls and of the ballot-boxes, come also the United States marshals, their general deputies, and their special deputies, without limit as to number, in order, in the language of section 2022, to—

Keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States.

Thus supported, and by still greater forces when called for as I shall show hereafter, the supervisors are absolute masters of the entire situation. Am I to be told that it lessens the outrage on local self-government because they are to be of different political parties? Does it mitigate the crime against the freedom of the ballot because the corrupt men of both or of all the parties in the country may be appointed by the administration in power to commit it? Sir, the man who is willing to accept the position of spy and informer on the honest voters of this country, who is willing to invade the rooms where their votes are received, and there seize their ballot-boxes, and arrest their judges of elections without process of law, can claim no political kindred with me. I repudiate all such as consent to become the instruments of Federal power for the overthrow of the doctrines and practices of the fathers, regardless of the party name they bear. Suppose we witness the operations of a pair of these supervisors on election day under the laws as they now stand. A Representative in Congress is to be chosen and so also is the governor of the State, and all the State and county officers on the same day and on the same ticket. The people of the precinct have assembled to vote for those who make their laws, and for others to execute them. A few old men are there whose fathers fought in the Revolution; here and there one who himself fought in the war of 1812, and was with Jackson at New Orleans; the middle-aged in the prime of manhood and the youth with his first ballot in his hand all mingle together with the proud sense that they are sovereign, especially on that day and at that place.

A room has been secured, and the judges and clerks of the election, selected by the people under the laws of their State, have taken their seats inside, near the accustomed window, for the convenient reception of votes. The judges are among the oldest and most respected citizens of the community, while the clerks are young men of integrity, and ready writers. All is ready for the great day's work to begin, and for the ballot to execute the will of freemen, when two Federal officials, strangers to the laws of the State, push forward and demand admittance. If the door or the window is not at once opened for their entrance they break them in without hesitation or delay, and proceed to take, occupy, and remain in such position, whether before or behind the ballot-box, as they please. They are directed by the law to so fix themselves in place and attitude as to best enable them, in their judgment, to watch the voters and to see their faces as they come up to deposit their ballots, and also to scrutinize the manner in which the officers of the election are conducting it. More unwelcome than Banquo's ghost, and with far greater powers, they force themselves into the seats of other men; but, unlike the spirit of that murdered chieftain, they do not appear to strike terror into a guilty conscience, but rather themselves to stab the cause of liberty to the heart. They are unlike that uneasy ghost in another particular: they never leave. From solid, odious substances they never vanish into thin air. They remain to the close of the banquet, masters of ceremony from the beginning to the end. But this is not all. If at these polls, where we are witnessing an election, a single spark of impatience or indignation should be manifested at the presence of these supervisors, and if any person by a word, a look, a gesture, or in any other conceivable way is thought by the supervisors themselves—for they are the sole judges on that subject—to obstruct or hinder them, or either of them, in their approach, their assault, or their occupancy, such person is "liable to instant arrest without process, and shall be punished by imprisonment not more than two years, or by a fine of not more than $3,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall pay the cost of the prosecution." If one of the old, gray-haired judges on the board of election inspired by the memory of other days, when such intruders would have been exterminated like marauding wolves in a sheep-fold, should protest by virtue of his authority as an officer of the State against being superseded and thrust aside, neither his age, his official character, nor the love and veneration of his neighbors will shelter him from instant arrest and the horrible punishment which I have just described. In proof of this statement I submit section 5522 of the Revised Statutes, with the earnest hope that every word of it will be read and carefully considered by the American people until the very name of supervisors of election becomes an abhorrence in the public mind. The section is as follows:

Every person, whether with or without any authority, power, or process, or pretended authority, power, or process, of any State, Territory, or municipality, who obstructs, hinders, assaults, or by bribery, solicitation, or otherwise, interferes with or prevents the supervisors of election, or either of them, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of any duty required of them, or either of them, or which he or they, or either of them, may be authorized to perform by any law of the United States, in the execution of process or otherwise, or who by any of the means before mentioned hinders or prevents the free attendance and presence at such places of registration or at such polls of election, or full and free access and egress to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or in going to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or to and from any room, where any such registration or election or canvass of votes, or of making any returns or certificates thereof, may be had, or who molests, interferes with, removes, or ejects from any such place of registration or poll of election, or of canvassing votes cast thereat, or of making returns or certificates thereof, any supervisor of election, the marshal, or his general or special deputies, or either of them; or who threatens, or attempts, or offers so to do, or refuses or neglects to aid and assist any supervisor of election, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of his or their duties, when required by him or them, or either of them, to give such aid and assistance, shall be liable to instant arrest without process, and shall be punished by imprisonment not more than two years, or by a fine of not more than $3,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall pay the cost of the prosecution.

Sir, I assert, in the hearing of the Senate and the country, that there is not one American voter, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean and from the chain of lakes on the north to the Gulf of Mexico, who is not liable to arrest any moment on election day at the polls, without any other accusation than exists in the mind of a supervisor or a deputy marshal, and with no other process or warrant than a club or a pair of handcuffs. I assert, and challenge denial, as long as this law stands, that every citizen of the United States holds his personal liberty while attending the polls and casting his ballot, solely and absolutely at the mere whim, caprice, impulse, party malice, or private hate of a supervisor, or of his coadjutor, the deputy marshal. If it is pretended that by section 2029 the supervisors of election for a county or a parish cannot make arrests, my answer is that the section which I have just read, section 5522, overrides all other provisions on this subject, and in express words authorizes the instant arrest, without process, of every person who may in any conceivable manner interfere with a supervisor or a deputy marshal at any place of registration or election in the United States where by law such officers are entitled to be present. No cause need be assigned for the arrest, either verbally or in writing. No oath or affirmation is required before the citizen is dragged away and locked up. It is only necessary for the mind of the overseer or the deputy marshal to fix an offense upon a voter, however innocent he may be, and his arrest follows as instantaneously as the explosion of powder follows the touch of fire. The silent, unspoken conclusions of irresponsible, ignorant, and brutal partisan ruffians are permitted, and indeed required, by existing laws to determine every man's right to personal liberty as he passes under their inspection at the polls. The language of the Constitution is:

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

What becomes of these sacred provisions? Who will pretend that the laws under discussion are in harmony with them? Who will pretend that laws, by virtue of which the people may be seized for purely imaginary offenses, or, what is even worse, for offenses created in the minds of malicious hireling spies and informers, and imprisoned without any accusation under oath, are sustained by the Constitution? If such was the fact, if indeed the Constitution did sanction such atrocious enactments, it would be conclusive proof that the heroes of the Revolution had died in vain, and that their blood was not shed in the cause of free government. Sir, these laws are not the offspring of that great instrument which has descended to us with ever-increasing strength and glory from the days of our revolutionary ancestors. They emanate rather from that malignant spirit of political oppression and tyranny which preceded the French revolution, and caused its fires at last to break forth; which filled the prisons of France with victims arrested on secret orders, and made every citizen tremble as one who fears a blow in the dark. They emanate from that spirit which ruled over Venice, when a whisper or a look of suspicion was more to be dreaded than the blow of a dagger, and when the silent and voiceless accusation doomed its object to walk the Bridge of Sighs into the caverns of a ruthless and lingering death. In English history there never was a period in which they could have been executed. Charles I lost his head, James II his throne, and George III his American colonies in attempting far less encroachments on the liberties of Englishmen than these laws perpetrate on the liberties of Americans. Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, suspended a sword by a single hair over the heads of his guests at a banquet, and enjoyed their terror. The party but yesterday in power in this Chamber has suspended over the heads of the American people and put into operation in their midst enactments far deadlier than the sword; for without the unassailable safeguards of personal liberty life itself is of no value. The Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has urged that opposition to these enactments is a false issue on the part of those who have not felt their cruel enforcement. He asserts that because the Federal election laws have not been called into active execution in some portions of the country, and troops have not been placed at all the polls, therefore the people have no reason for resentment. The tories of the Revolution argued the same way a hundred years ago on the stamp act and the tax on tea. They insisted that the claim of right to bind the colonies in all things put forth by the British Parliament could do no harm, and ought to be submitted to as long as no attempt was made to enforce it. But it was that very claim of right which made the Revolution. It was not the amount of the tax collected, or even demanded, that caused the sword of Bunker Hill to be drawn. It was the naked assertion of a principle subversive of local self-government which drove the colonists to armed resistance and kept the army of the Revolution in the field under Washington until American independence was secured. Our fathers were unwilling for a claim of despotic power to hang over them as a threat liable at any time to be put in execution. They revolted against the idea that they were to hold their rights subject only to the forbearance of their rulers. They resented the menace of the British government contained in its declaration of power as they would a personal indignity. Burke, in his speech of March, 1775, on conciliation with America, thus describes the colonists:

> In other countries the people, more simple and of a less mercurial cast, judge of an ill principle in government only by an actual grievance; here they anticipate the evil, and judge of the pressure of the grievance by the badness of the principle. They augur misgovernment at a distance and snuff the approach of tyranny in every tainted breeze.

This was the sublime sentiment of liberty which inspired Jefferson and John Adams, Patrick Henry and John Hancock; which welded together the toil-worn and destitute veterans of Virginia and Massachusetts in many a bitter and bloody charge. The sound of the clanking chains of political bondage was heard in the distance, and it was enough. They did not sit supinely and heedlessy until the manacles were fastened on their limbs. Are their descendants of this day so degenerate that they will wait until the hand of power clutches them by the throat and hurls them into prison before they will turn and destroy the laws which provide for such debasement? Shall we salute with reverence the tokens of tyranny, the emblems of our enslavement? The Swiss peasant refused to bow his uncovered head to the cap of the Austrian tyrant elevated as a sign of subjugation; and the hearts of brave men and fair women in all the four quarters of the globe have poured incense to the name of William Tell. John Hampden thought twenty shillings of ship-money too dear a price to pay for security, ease, peace, and life itself, as long as the prerogative to levy such a tax was claimed by the king; and he yielded up his peerless spirit on the plains of Chalgrave in defying an unjust principle of government. Notwithstanding the derision of the Senator from Maine, all history attests the danger of leaving instruments of usurpation and oppression ready for the use of those intrusted with executive authority. The usurper will come at last. The hour of his advent is inevitable. The temptations of supreme and arbitrary power have never yet failed to develop a Cæsar, a Cromwell, or a Napoleon, whenever the people have relaxed their vigilance and suffered their laws to pave the way toward despotism.

But in the present instance we have vastly more than the mere menace or threat of future subjugation by virtue of the laws under discussion. We are not left to conjecture what will be done hereafter. Already these laws have been executed over the prostrate forms and liberties of American citizens in a manner and to an extent which would arouse any people in Europe to revolt, except, perhaps, the serfs of Russia. I speak not now of the South, which has so long been considered a legitimate prey to the spoiler, but of the great, dominant, and stalwart North. Look to New York, that mighty emporium of the wealth and commerce of the western hemisphere. Scenes have been enacted there within the last few years which bring shame and disgrace to the Republic wherever they are known. John I. Davenport is chief supervisor of elections in the city of New York, appointed by the circuit court of the United States. He is also the clerk of the United States circuit court, and a United States commissioner. With all the powers of these manifold official positions combined in his own person he has indeed been the autocrat of the ballot-box. In the elections of 1876 he had under him one thousand and seventy supervisors, twenty-five hundred deputy marshals, and an indefinite number of commissioners, at an expense for them and for himself of $94,587.

In 1878 he employed twelve hundred and twenty-five supervisors, thirteen hundred and fifty deputy marshals, and commissioners in proportion, for all whose pay and expenses he drew upon the money of the people in the Treasury. In June, 1876, as clerk of the United States circuit court, he issued warrants for the arrest of twenty-six hundred naturalized voters to be brought before him as United States commissioner and chief supervisor for the purpose of making them surrender their naturalization papers. The Federal courts themselves afterward held that the naturalization papers in question were all legal and valid, but the desired result had been accomplished. The terror inspired by these arrests intimidated thousands from going to the polls. It became well known that there was no personal security in New York in connection with the elections, and the poor, the timid, and the humble staid away. The same course was pursued in 1878. During the summer of that year nine thousand four hundred citizens were notified that they would be arrested unless they surrendered their naturalization papers to the head-overseer, John I. Davenport. In the month of October, 1878, thirty-one hundred persons were actually arrested and a reign of terror inaugurated just in advance of the election. The pretense that these persons held fraudulent naturalization papers had already been shown to be false, but it was necessary to party success that an alarm should be raised and a panic created in the minds of foreign-born citizens and of the poor laboring classes generally.

The movement was successful, and it has been estimated that ten thousand legal voters remained away from the polls rather than risk the jails and the prison-pens of the chief supervisor and his subordinates. But it was reserved for the day of election itself to give free scope to the frightful powers with which this band of Federal ku-klux is invested. Those who braved the dangers which environed the ballot-box, and approached it as if they were still freemen, soon found their mistake. They quickly ascertained that the previous threats and warnings which they had heard were neither idle nor unmeaning. As a specimen of thousands of similar occurrences on election day, I quote a statement recently made by a member of the other branch of Congress from New York. Speaking from his place on the floor, he said:

> A neighbor of mine, who had resided in the same district for seventeen years and a soldier of the Union Army at that, was arrested. I was asked to go to the republican headquarters in an adjoining district, whither he had been taken. The street for an entire block was lined with carriages, in which the unfortunate citizens who had fallen into the hands of the Philistines had been or were to be conveyed. When I entered the building I found the front room decorated with the paraphernalia of a political headquarters, and filled with republican politicians. In the back room a United States commissioner was holding court. The door was closed, watched by a Cerberus. No one was allowed inside but the prisoners and the republican managers. After about half an hour's waiting I was informed by the doorkeeper that the man I was looking for was no longer there. I asked whither he had been taken. "Suppose to Fort Davenport," was the laconic reply.

Sir, most likely this soldier of the Union Army was with Grant in the Wilderness, at Cold Harbor, and at Petersburgh. Or perhaps he was with Sherman in his march to the sea, and as a soldier of the Army of the Tennessee took part in the bloody battle of Atlanta. Wherever he was, however, and on whatever field he was baptized with fire, he was assured that he was offering his life for the preservation of the Union under the safeguards of constitutional liberty. He was also assured that human slavery should not survive the triumph of the Union cause, and he rejoiced to believe that his country would in fact soon be the land only of the free. What must have been his reflections, therefore, in November last to find, in attempting to cast his ballot, that he was as very a slave in the hands of a brutal overseer as any negro ever driven in a cotton-field, and that he had no more power under existing laws to protect his personal freedom than an African bondsman on the auction-block before the war. Did he not, most probably, conclude that one of the fruits of the war, under the nurture and cultivation of the republican party, was the extension of slavery, rather than its overthrow and destruction? Was he not impressed with the fact that the liberation of one race had been followed by the enslavement of another? What were his thoughts, and the thoughts of his fellow victims, who had also been his fellow-soldiers, as they lay like felons in prison, in "Fort Davenport," for offering to vote? How did their bitter thoughts in that hour of degradation compare with their glorious dreams as they often lay together on the tented field; when their—

> —— Bugles sang truce; for the night-cloud had lowered,
> And the sentinel stars set their watch in the sky;
> And thousands had sunk on the ground overpowered—
> The weary to sleep, and the wounded to die.

In such an hour as this they dreamed not only of returning to the dear ones at home, of their rapturous, clinging embrace, and burning kiss, but they likewise dreamed of returning to a land of liberty, to homes made free from the invasive steps of the spy and informer, and to a state of personal security under laws of their own making. These bright dreams have all vanished, and in their place the returned soldier, and all others, have embraced a reality as horrible and as unbearable to the soul of a man fit to be free as Dante's conceptions of Inferno are to the Christian mind. The following description of election day in Davenport's court in New York is said to be but a tame and imperfect presentment of the facts as they there transpire from year to year as the elections occur:

Such a scene as the rooms of this court presented on that election day has never before been witnessed in this city or in this country, and it is to be hoped never will again. From early morning until after the polls were closed these rooms were packed and jammed with a mass of prisoners and marshals. Not only were they crowded beyond their capacity, but the halls and corridors were thronged with those who were unable to obtain admission, so that the counsel representing the prisoners and the bondsmen who were offered to secure their release had the greatest difficulty, and were frequently unsuccessful in obtaining entrance. In addition to all this was that delectable iron "pen" on the upper floor, in which men were crowded until it resembled the black hole of Calcutta, and where they were kept for hours hungry, thirsty, suffering in every way, until their cases could be reached. With scarcely an exception these men had gone to the polls expecting to be absent but a short time. Many of them were thinly clad; numbers had sick wives or relatives; some were sick themselves. There were carmen who had left their horses standing in the public streets; men whose situations depended on their speedy return; men who wished to leave the city on certain trains. Every imaginable vexation, inconvenience, injury, and wrong which the mind can conceive existed in their cases, so that it was painful for the counsel who were endeavoring to secure their release to approach sufficiently near the railing to hear their piteous appeals and witness the distress which they had no power to alleviate. And over all this pushing, struggling, complaining crowd Mr. Commissioner John I. Davenport sat supreme, with a sort of oriental magnificence, calmly indifferent to everything but the single fact that no man who was arrested was allowed to vote.

May I not, in view of this dark and shameful picture, appeal to Senators without impropriety to know whither we are drifting? Are we still hugging the miserable delusion that there is no danger, while scenes are being enacted in strict accordance with the laws on our statute-books which would be a disgrace to Turkish civilization if enacted by the arbitrary authority of the Sultan? Has a fatal lethargy seized the American people, and are we indeed to follow the downward pathway of all the republics that have risen and fallen in the past? The sailor in northern seas veers off into safer waters the moment he feels the current of the great Maelstrom under his keel. We are in the very vortex of the whirlpool wherein every local privilege, every right of citizenship, all the sanctuaries of home, and the ship of state itself are being drawn down and dashed to pieces, and yet the cry that all is well, uttered by false pilots, lulls us into a sense of security and repose. I call upon my countrymen to awaken, for the hour of mortal peril to their institutions is here. What has happened in New York has happened elsewhere, and may happen everywhere. Shall the laws which make such scenes possible remain in force? I invoke against them the memories of the mighty dead who fell for independence; who enriched the soil of Massachusetts with their blood at Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill; who struggled with Washington at Brandywine, and charged under his eye at Princeton, Trenton, and Monmouth; who tasted death at Camden, the Cowpens, and Eutaw Springs, in order that we might be free; who yielded up their brave spirits on the plains of Yorktown in the precious hour of final victory. By these great souls, by their privations, sorrows, anguish, and pain, I implore the American people not to forget the value of those liberties which are now trampled under foot with every circumstance of scorn and contempt.

At this point, however, and in this connection, another branch of legislation on the subject of popular elections calls for our consideration. In presenting the elaborate and carefully constructed system of laws for the suppression of self-government, we are next confronted by those provisions which place the land and naval forces of the United States at the polls. Those who conceived and enacted these laws were not content until the sword as well as the purse of the nation was prostituted to the suppression of free elections. I have only to appeal to the laws themselves to make good this statement, strong as it may appear. The section most familiar to the public mind is 5528 of the Revised Statutes, and is often cited in proof of the harmless purposes of the Army. It has in fact, at a hasty glance, a somewhat innocent aspect, but a moment's inspection will show that like the Trojan horse its real object is to carry armed men into a citadel—in this instance the citadel of liberty—without exciting suspicion or resistance. It was enacted in February, 1865, and its language is as follows:

Every officer of the Army or Navy or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years.

Here is simply a cheap display of pretended severity against military interference with elections, while the sole purpose of the section was to authorize the presence of armed troops at the polls under the vague pretext of keeping the peace. Sir, who is to determine the necessity of the presence of the Army or the Navy at the place of voting on election day to keep the peace? Who is to pass upon this plea of military necessity and give the command to close in on the ballot-box with the bayonet? Under this section it is evident that the President of the United States as Commander-in-Chief would have that duty to perform. What a dazzling field here opens for the operations of a usurper! It is matter of history that Cæsar while in Gaul sent his emissaries to Rome to incite riots and disturbances at the elections in order to give him the pretext he craved, to keep the peace at the polls with his trained legions at his back. Napoleon the Great crushed the liberties of France under the tyrant's usual guise of preserving public order by force of arms; and Napoleon the Lesser in our own day followed his example. What a temptation is presented, by the section I have read, to some American Executive to practice the same usurpations! He has only to stir up troubles through his partisan emissaries in the South, as has often been done heretofore, and the occasion is made for the use of the Army to any extent he may choose. He is the judge of the number of troops and the time they are to move and the places they are to invest. He may order any number of ships of war into the harbor of New York or in front of New Orleans on election day or at any time before that day to overawe the people, simply avowing that he does so under this law to keep the peace at the polls. It is difficult to conceive that such an enactment could be found among the statutes of a republic, but it is my painful duty to show two others on the same subject far more dangerous, if possible, than this. Section 1989, found in the Revised Statutes under the title "civil rights," confers on the President in express terms the powers which are implied in section 5528. There is no attempt here to deceive. The Army and Navy are boldly placed at the disposal of the President to use at his discretion over a range of subjects and in the control of their details as extensive as the rights of man under a free constitution. The words of the section are as follows:

It shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as may be necessary to aid in the execution of judicial process issued under any of the preceding provisions, or as shall be necessary to prevent the violation and enforce the due execution of the provisions of this title.

There are fifteen sections in this title, and they embrace the assertion and enforcement of every right and privilege known to American citizenship. They were prepared and enacted for the purpose of placing the negro on an exact equality in every particular with the white man before the law, and they consequently cover as much ground as the Constitution itself. For instance, the first section of this title provides for the right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence; and the second section provides for the right to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property. It is made lawful for the President, at his own will and pleasure, and without reference to State laws on these subjects, to launch the Army into any State he may choose to crush, under the pretense of enforcing these provisions or preventing their violation. The third section of this title relates to actions at law and suits in equity for damages by such as deem themselves deprived of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws. The fourth section treats of conspiracies—first, to intimidate persons from accepting and holding office; second, to deter witnesses from testifying in any United States court to influence grand or petit jurors, or in any manner to impede or defeat the due course of justice; and, third, to deprive any class of persons of the equal protection of the laws, or to prevent any one from voting for the candidate of his choice. The section concludes by giving a right of civil suit for damages to any one conceiving himself aggrieved under its provisions. Other sections follow of intricate and diversified character, but I have cited enough to show the vast and sweeping scope of the duties devolved on the Army and Navy by virtue of section 1989 and the absolute supremacy of one-man power there created. Under the wide and universal provisions of the civil-rights title, which we are now considering, there is not a phase in human affairs wherein the Army and Navy of the United States cannot be called by the Executive to prevent or to enforce the execution of some act by individuals, States, and Territories. Section 1989 contemplates the military control of elections not only, but of everything else that belongs to the States, Territories, counties, cities, and every other species of municipality. It utterly abrogates the Constitution of the United States. By that instrument, section 4, article 4, the extent of the power of the Federal Government to send troops to a State is defined:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

This short and pregnant sentence marks the boundaries, as understood by the fathers, between the Federal Government and the States in regard to the character and enforcement of State constitutions and laws. There has been much confusion of ideas and the wildest vagaries of construction growing out of this clause of the Federal Constitution, and especially in relation to that part of it which guarantees to every State a republican form of government. I have heard it contended in debate in Congress that by virtue of this power of guarantee the Federal Government could unseat members of a State Legislature, annul laws of their enactment, direct other members to be sworn in and other laws to be enacted, and in a general and in an especial manner take charge of all local interests. All this, too, was to be upheld and enforced by United States military authority if necessary. Sir, may it not be well to understand exactly what it is that the Federal Government is called on to guarantee to the States? A republican form of government is something easily defined. The term "republic," as applied to a political organization, is derived from the two Latin words, res, a thing, an affair, and publica, public, meaning a public affair in which all have a common interest, in which there is neither royalty nor rank fixed by law. Webster defines a republican form of government to be:

A state in which the sovereign power is exercised by representatives elected by the people; a commonwealth.

Taking this as the true meaning of the expression used in the Federal Constitution, and we have no difficulty in understanding that when a State has framed and adopted a constitution in harmony therewith, and maintains it, the Federal Government has no more power to interfere with or send armed forces into the State, except upon its own application to resist invasion or to suppress domestic violence, than the State has to assume the functions of the Federal Government. If the Legislature of a State should pass laws repugnant to the Constitution or the laws of the United States, which together with treaties are the supreme law, the courts are charged with the duty of arresting them. If riots break out at elections, or on any other occasion, begetting domestic violence which the State cannot put down; or if invasion occurs, and the State calls for assistance in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, then and only then can the Government of the United States come to its relief in martial array. A contrary doctrine to this, the doctrine contained in the section under discussion, changes this Government in the twinkling of an eye from a republic to a consolidated military despotism, governed in all its parts and details by the Army and Navy, at the sole behest of the Commander-in-Chief, the President of the United States. There is no more escape from this conclusion than there is from the evidence of our senses that light follows the morning and darkness the night. By this section the President is left to determine everything, and to execute without restraint from any quarter his arbitrary conclusions. He may declare it necessary to aid in the execution of judicial process with the Army in any portion of the country, whether it is so or not. He may declare any city of over twenty thousand inhabitants, or any county or parish in the United States, in a state of insurrection, station troops in them, proclaim martial law, and cut them off from all communication with other parts of the world.

But there remains one more section authorizing the use of the Army and Navy to subvert free elections which demands our attention. I turn to it, I confess, with feelings of repugnance. It completes the degradation of that Army and Navy whose fame and glory fill the whole earth. It shows to what base uses the heroes of a hundred battles may be put by the vaulting ambition of radical partisans. It is section 1984, and reads as follows:

The commissioners authorized to be appointed by the preceding section are empowered, within their respective counties, to appoint, in writing, under their hands, one or more suitable persons, from time to time, who shall execute all such warrants or other process as the commissioners may issue in the lawful performance of their duties, and the persons so appointed shall have authority to summon and call to their aid the bystanders or posse comitatus of the proper county, or such portion of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as may be necessary to the performance of the duty with which they are charged; and such warrants shall run and be executed anywhere in the State or Territory within which they are issued.

The warrants or other process mentioned in this section, and which the commissioners may issue, are such as are provided for the arrest and intimidation of voters before elections on election day, and afterward. They are such as are contemplated in chapter 7 of the title "Crimes," on which I have already commented. We behold, therefore, by virtue of this most amazing section, the Army and Navy of the United States, not placed under the command of the President or such person as he may empower, presumably an officer of high rank and character, to regulate and control elections, but ordered to obey the "summon and call" of the lowest agents, and, naturally, the vilest instruments of this whole pernicious business. Let us pause and look for a moment at the scene which is here provided for. The circuit courts of the United States and the district courts of the Territories are authorized by section 1983 to increase the number of commissioners from time to time, so as to afford a speedy and convenient means for the arrest and examination of persons charged with crimes against the election laws, until the whole land shall swarm with commissioners bent on the success of their party. Then these commissioners, appointed for a political purpose, are empowered in every county in the United States to appoint one or more persons whom they may deem suitable to execute their process and carry out their edicts. And how astounding and incredible it seems, in this age of advanced civilization, that these innumerable deputy commissioners, these irresponsible sublessees of unconstitutional power, should have, by the express words of American law, the authority to summon and call to their aid not merely the bystanders and the posse comitatus of the county, but such portion of the land or naval forces of the United States or of the militia as they may consider necessary to the performance of their duties!

Here are the plain words of the law, and there is not a Senator on this floor who will gainsay my statement. Sir, who are these people on whom the most tremendous powers known to human governments have been so lavishly bestowed? I have no word of disparagement for United States commissioners, appointed to perform the legitimate duties of that useful office, but for political instruments, thrust by partisan hate and ambition into that position, and for those still below them, I have neither respect nor forbearance. The experience of the last few years in the different States, and notably in New York, shows that political commissioners, their deputies and subordinates, foisted into the control of elections, belong essentially to that class of human pests so powerfully described by Curran in his defense of Rowan, who, in the language of the great Irishman, "overwhelmed in the torrent of corruption at an early period, lay at the bottom like drowned bodies while soundness or sanity remained in them; but at length becoming buoyant by putrefaction, they rose as they rotted and floated to the surface of the polluted stream, where they were drifted along, the objects of terror and contagion and abomination."

Yet of such as these are made the commanders of the military and naval forces of this Government; to these miserable, cringing camp-followers of any party in power, occupying, as they do, the lowest and most disreputable places in the rear rank of political warfare, the proudest plumed chieftains, the most peerless warriors on land and sea, must bow their tall heads and obey their mandates. Will some Senator tell me how the brave and brilliant Sherman, bearing a higher rank than even Washington ever bore, is to escape obedience to a deputy United States commissioner? Will some one point out to me how, under the law as it now stands, Sheridan, Hancock, or the Secretary of War himself, is to refuse military subjection and co-operation to any offspring of the political sewer appointed by a United States commissioner and bearing a warrant or other process for the arrest of a citizen charged with an offense against the election laws? I assert, fearless of contradiction, that under the section I have read the veriest reptile of ward politics, the most abandoned scavenger of party warfare, armed with a commissioner's appointment and any sort of process against the liberty of an American citizen, can call the whole Army and Navy to his support, and the tallest heads must bow to his command. The scarred and veteran legions who bore the eagles of the Republic in triumph in Mexico and who are yet in the Army; the dauntless, chivalric, and generous hearts who closed with their own equal kindred in the mortal grasp of civil war; all these, and others besides, are placed at the beck and nod of a commander selected by a United States commissioner.

I will not stop to say that this is monstrous. That will be the universal verdict. I will not pause to denounce such laws as wholly infamous, for that will be the judgment not only of the American people but of all the civilized nations of the world. Simply to call up and exhibit such a horrible death's head as this in the laws of a Commonwealth pretending to be free is enough to excite the jeers, the hisses, and the execrations of every lover of liberty on the habitable globe. The Army and the Navy of the United States! How often the banquet hall and the festive board have rung with eloquence in their praise! How often their achievements have been the theme of poetry and of song! Whose heart has not swelled with emotion at the mention of revolutionary fields of fame? Whose eye has not kindled at the story of Lundy's Lane, the Thames, Tippecanoe, and New Orleans? Whose spirit does not feel exalted when Buena Vista, Monterey, Cerro Gordo, Cherubusco, and Chapultepec pass in stately review? And whose eyes have not grown moist and dim with enthusiasm in reading the battles of the ocean, those deadly conflicts of the sea which have made American genius and courage as imperishable in history as the fixed stars are in the heavens over our heads?

Sir, these sentiments are universal in the American heart, but who now will speak the eulogy or sing in heroic verse the deeds of the Army and the Navy of the United States used to overthrow free elections under the command of deputy United States commissioners? Others may answer the question; I cannot. History, however, gives no uncertain answer as to the final result of such legislation. All the free governments of the past have withered away and perished by the introduction of military force into the management of their civil affairs. We will prove no exception to this invariable rule. Even in England, the home of monarchy, governed by kings and queens and a hereditary nobility, the people, nearly a hundred and fifty years ago, demanded and enforced the entire absence of troops from the polls on election day, in order that they might preserve their rights, whatever they were, under the British constitution. A committee of this body on a former occasion described the objects of the well-known statute of George II in the following terms:

It cannot escape notice that the leading object of this ancient statute, as sufficiently evidenced by the preamble, was the preservation of the rights and liberties of the kingdom, not their destruction. And the history of the times shows that the prohibition to keep military forces near places where there was an election of members of Parliament, arose from outrages practiced upon the electors by the ministers in posting troops so as to overawe them, and coerce them into the returning of candidates friendly to the ministerial party, and the supporters of prerogative against popular rights.

This description of the use of the military on election day sounds painfully familiar at this time to American ears. Our ancestors, even in the dark reign of the second George, a century and a half ago, would not brook such outrages upon the electors. Are we, with all the increase of light and liberty now in the world, to be denounced for demanding just what they did? The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in his recent speech found nothing to censure or disapprove in the use of the Army or the Navy to control elections. Another Senator from the same State held different views. Daniel Webster declared:

If men would enjoy the blessings of republican government they must govern themselves by reason, by mutual counsel, and consultation, by a sense and feeling of general interest, and by the acquiescence of the minority in the will of the majority properly expressed; and above all the military must be kept, according to the language of our bill of rights, in strict subordination to the civil authority.

Wherever this lesson is not learned and practiced there can be no political freedom. Absurd, preposterous is it, a scoff, and a satire on free forms of constitutional liberty, for forms of government to be prescribed by military leaders, and the right of suffrage to be exercised at the point of the sword.

Passing, however, in the order of discussion to another part of this general system for the suppression of free elections, I approach next the improper use of the Federal judiciary. A greater calamity than political courts hardly ever befell any people. There is no form of oppression so dangerous as judicial unfairness. An armed invasion of constitutional rights can be speedily met by armed resistance. Force provokes force in return, and the humblest intellect can comprehend such an issue as quickly as the greatest. The proceedings of courts, on the other hand, are not always plain to the common mind. Little by little they can, by false constructions, destroy the principles of free government unobserved except by the few who are learned in the law. Judges, therefore, of a partisan bias, carrying with them on the bench party convictions and party zeal, are of all the officers of the Government the most formidable instruments of political warfare. It was of such as these that Jefferson spoke in 1820 when he said:

The judiciary of the United States is the subtle corps of sappers and miners constantly working under ground to undermine the foundations of our confederated fabric. They are construing our Constitution from a co-ordination of a general and special government to a general and supreme one alone.

It was in view also of partisan judges that he said:

Our judges are as honest as other men and not more so. They have, with others, the same passions for party, for power, and the privilege of their corps. Their maxim is "boni judicis est ampliare jurisdictionem," and their power the more dangerous as they are in office for life, and not responsible, as the other functionaries are, to the elective control.

It is indeed a most obvious fact, verified by the experience of all ages, as well as by the wisdom of the foremost minds in history, that courts of justice cannot be invested with political purposes without demoralizing the whole judicial system, and inflicting danger on every right belonging to the citizen. Yet the judiciary of the United States has been boldly seized upon, and nearly all its parts applied to the support and permanence of a political party. The authors of the laws for that purpose made the circuit and the district courts of the United States the fountain and the beginning of the entire plot against the freedom of the ballot-box. Any two persons filled with party zeal in a city or town of over twenty thousand inhabitants, or any ten persons under the same inspiration in a county or parish without respect to population can command the Federal courts at their pleasure. At their orders the circuit judge shall open court, and in his absence the district judge shall obey the call. This shall occur in vacation as well as term time, and the court shall remain open, or in the language of the law, "be always open for the transaction of business under this title," that is to say, the business of the elections, until the elections are over. Not only is the court to be always open, but the judge is to be pursued to his chambers by eager local party leaders where he has the same powers on this subject as when sitting in court. The absolute subserviency of the Federal judges, wherever found, whether in court or in chambers, being thus secured, their duties are necessarily of an injurious and odious character. Every squad of supervisors of elections, equipped as spies, informers, bailiffs, and burglars at the ballot-box, emanate directly from the hands and seals of the Federal judiciary.

The chief supervisor, the commander in chief in certain respects of this invading force, is likewise an offspring of judicial prostitution. So also the innumerable hordes of political United States commissioners contemplated and authorized by section 1983, and all their deputies under them, with power as I have shown, to command the Army and the Navy; all these strange and illegitimate election officials spring from the Federal courts, embraced as they have been by an arrogant and lawless political party. The deputy United States marshals, unlimited in number and viciously partisan in purpose, have in fact a similar origin, for they are appointed by the marshal, always in political accord with the Administration in power and always subject to the influence and control of the court. Can it be necessary to show that the framers of the Constitution never designed the Federal judiciary for such base ends as these? Can it be necessary to show that the appointment and control of election officers constitute no part of the judicial power of this Government? The Constitution declares:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

It also further declares:

The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority;—to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects.

This list of carefully enumerated powers comprises all that the Constitution devolves on the Federal judiciary. Will some Senator point out to me the clause which authorizes United States judges to appoint officers to manage popular elections? The judicial power of the United States has been given to the Federal courts, and the subjects to which that power can be applied have been specifically designated. Is there anything in this specific designation which relates to the control of Federal, State, county, parish, city, or town elections? Is it a judicial function to appoint a supervisor or a chief supervisor of elections? Is it a judicial duty imposed by the Constitution to open court, keep open court, and sit in chambers at the command of excited and prejudiced politicians? It is a burlesque on the memory of our fathers to pretend that laws imposing such services and duties on the judges of the United States courts are constitutional. I am aware that by virtue of the latter clause of section 2, article 2, of the Constitution it is claimed that Congress has the power to confer upon the United States courts the appointment of certain inferior officers, and among them the election officers to whom I object. That clause is in these words:

But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

But a construction has been placed on this provision which shows that Congress cannot authorize the courts or the heads of Departments to make appointments outside of their respective spheres of duty. In the case Ex parte Duncan N. Herman, 13 Peters, 257, the Supreme Court of the United States pass upon this question as follows:

By the Constitution of the United States, article 2, section 2, it is provided that the President shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, certain officers therein designated, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they shall think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments. The appointing power here designated in the latter part of the section was no doubt intended to be exercised by the Department of the Government to which the officer to be appointed most appropriately belonged. The appointment of clerks of courts properly belongs to the courts of law, and that a clerk is one of the inferior officers contemplated by this provision in the Constitution cannot be questioned.

Will any one contend, however, in view of this decision, that because the courts have been authorized to appoint their own clerks and other inferior officers appropriately belonging to the courts, they can also be authorized by Congress to appoint all the clerks in the various Departments? Will any one insist that Congress has the power to vest the appointment of postmasters, revenue collectors, and custom-house officials in the courts of law? It was the plain purpose of the Constitution, as decided by the Supreme Court, that Congress might simply devolve upon the courts of law the appointment of such officers as were necessary and appropriate to the exercise of judicial duties, and upon the heads of Departments a similar appointing power over persons appropriately connected with Department duties. Sir, where does a supervisor of elections appropriately belong? Is he a part of our judicial system? Do the duties of the courts of law extend to a seizure of the polls on election day, to the removal of the ballot-box from the proper custody of State officers, to the counting and canvassing of the votes, and to the instant arrest of voters without process? Are these some of the duties of the Federal judiciary under the Constitution? Were the United States courts originally organized for the purpose, among other things, of inspecting American citizens while depositing their ballots, of having spies placed in favorable positions to watch the countenances and gestures, and to overhear the talk of the voters on election day, of engendering a foul and loathsome brood of informers to pollute with their perjuries the sanctuaries of justice? Did the authors of the Constitution invest the courts with power to appoint a class of election commissioners, who in turn can appoint their own underlings to the command of the land and naval forces of the United States?

If these questions can be answered in the affirmative, and if such duties were actually imposed on the courts, then, and only then, can Congress make use of the courts for the appointment of supervisors, commissioners, and other officers for the invasion of local self-government. On the contrary, it is clear to my mind that Congress has no such power, and that the Federal courts have been debauched for political ends and party success, in open and flagrant violation of the Constitution. The founders of this Government aimed to create an impartial and independent judiciary, with no other than judicial duties to contemplate or to perform. Such a judiciary can only be maintained by its entire separation from all party issues, considerations, or management. The minister of the gospel, standing in holy places, must not be more free from the taint of the world than the judge from political feeling or bias.

And not only the evil itself, but the very appearance of the evil must be avoided. I once witnessed a signal illustration of this idea. A distinguished judge of one of the State courts of Indiana was holding court at a time of high political excitement in a strongly democratic county. It was brought to his attention that the grand jury was made up entirely from the democratic party, of which he was himself a prominent member. He at once discharged the panel, remarking that it was as necessary to satisfy the people that the administration of justice in their courts was free from political influences as that in fact it should be so. He held, most justly and wisely, that no greater evil could befall the cause of good government than a loss of confidence on the part of the people in the purity and impartiality of their courts. And yet at this moment the Revised Statutes of the United States are crowded with laws inspired and enacted in the very rage of party bitterness and ambition, which pour the whole business of party contests and party elections into the once sacred precincts of the Federal courts! The mere contact even of such subjects with the judicial mind is unwholesome to the cause of justice; but when judges are required and are willing to become active instruments in their control the fountains of our jurisprudence have received a deadly poison.

It is in this connection, too, that the perversion of the jury system to political purposes by test oaths assumes its most important and most alarming aspect. Sections 820 and 821, excluding from the jury-box all such as in any way participated in the late rebellion, are simply parts of a general system of legislation placing the entire machinery of the Federal courts, including the grand and petit juries, in strict alliance with the fortunes of a political party. In at least eleven States these sections surrender the finding of indictments and trials by jury in the United States courts to negroes, controlled by party leaders, and to a still more unworthy class of white men. The intelligence, the cultivation, the public virtue, all such as are responsible for the peace, order, and welfare of society, are disqualified as jurors if they joined in the rebellion or if they gave it aid or comfort in money, arms, horses, clothes, or anything whatever for the use or benefit of any person who had joined or was about to join. If the son was in the confederate army and his father gave him shelter over night, his breakfast next morning, and a change of clothing, neither father nor son can now serve on a jury in a Federal court anywhere in the United States. Such legislation as this has had its parallel only in enslaved countries like Poland, Hungary, and Ireland, where courts were organized by the governing party, as they have been now for the first time in this country, to convict, oppress, and keep in subjugation entire States and communities on account of their political principles. Laws of this kind were never before found on the statute-books of any government claiming to establish equality, fraternity, and liberty among its citizens. It is difficult to understand how any further political use could be made of the Federal judiciary, or how any additional indignity could be inflicted on its character. But the patient ingenuity of those who designed the perpetual ascendency of their party by overawing the people sounded one more depth into which they compelled the courts to descend. By section 1988 of the Revised Statutes it is made lawful for the President to order the judges, marshals, and district attorneys from place to place at his own will and pleasure, whether in term time or in vacation, for the purpose of the more speedy arrest and trial of persons charged with offenses against the election laws. This extraordinary section reads in the following words:

> Whenever the President has reason to believe that offenses have been, or are likely to be, committed against the provisions of chapter 7 of the Title Crimes, within any judicial district, it shall be lawful for him, in his discretion, to direct the judge, marshal, and district attorney of such district to attend at such place within the district, and for such time as he may designate, for the purpose of the more speedy arrest and trial of persons so charged, and it shall be the duty of every judge or other officer, when any such requisition is received by him, to attend at the place and for the time therein designated.

In the old and darker days of English jurisprudence we read of juries in a state of disagreement being carted through the circuit from one point to another until coerced into finding a verdict, but I think this is the first instance in civilized history where the court itself, with all its officers, was compelled to travel, to stop, and to open for business at the discretion and the command of executive authority. The President, perhaps a candidate for re-election, has only to pretend to believe that offenses are likely to be committed and he can at once send the courts where he pleases, to remain as long as he orders, intimidating and overawing the inhabitants of any county, parish, or town that is politically opposed to him. The judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States are reduced to a state of itinerancy for political purposes whenever any Administration from motives of party success shall order them to move on. If some distant seaboard town or some point on a navigable stream should become obnoxious to the President or stand in the way of his ambition, the laws of the United States as they now exist authorize him, at his own discretion, to invest it on the land side with the Army, on the water side with the Navy, and at the same time locate a Federal court in its midst to dispose of the prisoners at a special assize. This conjunction of all the great powers of this Government in the hands of the Executive is not accidental nor the result of thoughtless action. It is the climax of a premeditated system for the complete withdrawal of all powers from the people and the States and for their centralization in the executive department. It is the logical conclusion of a well-wrought plan, perfect in all its details, for a revolution toward consolidation and ultimate monarchy. There was a party when our Constitution was formed in favor of what they styled a higher-toned government; that is to say, a government further removed from the sovereign will of the common people. The idea of such a government was embraced in the draught of a constitution presented to the convention of 1787 by the great leader of the federalists providing for a hereditary monarchy and corresponding departments of government. There is a far larger party to-day in this country in favor of the principles then enunciated than there was at that time, and the laws are now in force to put them at once into active operation.

And what cause is to be assigned for all these violent departures from the original principles and purposes of this Government? Who will stand forth and justify them, and say why the very elements of civil liberty must now be destroyed in our midst? Is this massive structure of despotism, created by the laws I have pointed out, made necessary by the results of the war which ended fourteen years ago; and must it be upheld for the government of the Southern States? If so, then indeed has the North paid a dearer price than has ever yet been estimated for the preservation of the Union. Time repairs the loss of treasure and assuages a nation's grief for her gallant dead, but for the loss of liberty there is no compensation, and after it there comes no resurrection. The conquest of the South at the expense of free elections and upright courts would be a most dismal and barren victory, recoiling with curses on this and all succeeding generations. What shall it profit the American people if they gain the whole earth and lose their own liberties?

But I utterly deny that anything in the conduct or condition of the southern people requires such laws as now blacken the pages of our statutes. They have borne the results of the war with patient submission to every form of force or of law that has been imposed upon them. Their States were torn down and reconstructed from their foundations up for the purpose of establishing the supremacy of the republican party throughout the South. Aliens, strangers, and enemies went into their midst, seized upon their places of honor, trust, and profit, and grew fat on the remains of their broken fortunes. Political emissaries from the North have, at the approach of every important election, penetrated all portions of the South in order to incite strife between the two races for its effect on the northern mind. The leaders of the republican party have falsely proclaimed the existence of insurrections in the Southern States a thousand times since the war closed, and have sorely regretted from year to year that the people of those States could not be goaded into even a show of armed resistance. And the southern people are now reaping the reward of their brave forbearance. They have regained the rights of local self-government to the same extent as their fellow-citizens of the North; they control their own States; they have re-established domestic peace and social order, and are rapidly repairing the widespread devastations of war. They have done more. They have vindicated themselves, under the most trying circumstances, as a law-abiding people, and have fastened upon their enemies the odious crime of calumny and slander. Others may if they choose conjure up with evil magic the fierce sectional spirits that led to rivers of blood in the past; I will not. Nor do I envy the heart of the man who engages in such a work. His efforts are at war with the peace and glory of his country, and his name will be preserved by the future historian to illustrate the obstacles which progress and Christian civilization had to overcome.

Sir, my task on this occasion draws to a close. I have confined myself to the discussion of a series of laws which are, in my judgment, wholly fatal to free government. Among others, I have pointed out those for the repeal or modification of which the party to which I belong stands pledged. The issue thus joined is not sectional. It now concerns the personal liberty of the northern as much as it does the southern voter. The destruction originally aimed at free elections, and an independent judiciary in the South extends now to every section of the Union alike. I ask the American tax-payer, regardless of his locality, whether he approves that system of destruction? When we vote away his hard-earned money on this floor, I ask him whether we ought not first to guarantee to him his liberties and give him the protection of a freeman at the ballot-box and in the courts?

That is the sole question here this hour. Shall the tax-payer receive as compensation for his toil the blessings of self-government; or shall he like Issachar of old crouch down between two burdens, the burden of debt, and the burden of enslavement both? Shall he bow his shoulder to bear, and become a servant unto tribute, with no more rights in the control of his own government than election overseers, deputy marshals, commissioners, and political courts may see fit to grant him? That is the naked question for the people to decide. Others have discussed with great ability the manner in which the repeal of these laws is proposed. I have no concern on that point. If they are obnoxious to freedom and justice they ought to fall, and no better time or place for their repeal could occur than in connection with measures appropriating the people's money for the support of their Government. The cheap and shallow cry of revolution will deceive nobody, not even those who want to be deceived. The people will principally care to know the true character of the laws under consideration, and they will judge our work here accordingly. If the laws we propose to repeal are right we will stand condemned in the public mind; but if on the other hand they are odious in the sight of the American people we will be justified.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, in the question presented by the bill making appropriations for the Army there are two features that I desire to discuss: first, and very briefly, the method of legislation with reference to this bill, and after that, as briefly as possible, the constitutional right of the Government of the United States to control and supervise the election of Representatives in Congress. There has been so much said with reference to the method pursued to accomplish the purpose of the majority of this body and the majority of the House that I shall not detain the Senate at any great length upon that question, and I may say here not at any very great length upon the other.

It has been said here that it is a usual and customary way of repealing obnoxious laws or enacting laws supposed to be desirable by attaching them to an appropriation bill. Precedents have been appealed to, both in Great Britain and in this country, in order to justify that course. English history has been ransacked for a precedent to support such a case as this. How utterly and entirely the friends of the bill who have made this assertion have failed has been shown by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] and I need not repeat what he said, or any part of it, upon that subject. Our own precedents have been examined, and it was attempted to be shown by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] the other day that a large number of general statutes had been attached to appropriation bills.

Mr. President, that is not the question presented to the Senate today. The question is whether the Senate and House will present to the President a bill which the majority of the House and the Senate as now constituted have every reason to suppose the Executive of the nation would veto, untrammeled by this appropriation bill, undismayed by threats made on that side of the Chamber that if he did not sign the bill the Government should be left without the means of carrying on the ordinary duties of government. That is the question presented. At the last session the House sent this proposition to the Senate, then differently constituted politically from what it is now, and a majority of the Senate were disposed not to assent to this proposed change of the law. I will not quote the language of Senators, I will not go down to the very letter, but no man will deny on the other side of the Chamber, as everybody understood on this side at the time, that proclamation was made, first, that the Senate, holding differently from the House, must yield its judgment to the House or the appropriation bills should not pass at all; and then it was foreshadowed that when in the course of time the Senate should change politically, if the President, entertaining the views that a majority of the party who elected him entertained, entertaining the views that I have no doubt the Senator who made the remarks had some reasons to think he did entertain, refused to assent to the bill, they would then withhold appropriations for carrying on the Government.

I say that is the question presented to the Senate and to the Executive and to the American people, and it is not a question whether there have been at some time in the history of this country appropriation bills passed with general legislation in them. I challenge the gentlemen on the other side to show a single parallel in the history of this country with the case now before the Senate. By an examination of some of the debates it has been shown that some men have heretofore made threats of this kind of legislation, but it has been condemned by the wisest and best men in the country and was denounced, long before any of the present members of the Senate save one was in the body, as revolutionary and calculated to destroy the Government if persisted in.

It is said that the King of Great Britain was called upon to redress grievances in this way. Not for nearly two hundred years, not since the people of Great Britain have had an established and fixed constitution, not since the prerogative of the king has been thoroughly settled and understood by the House of Commons, has this course been attempted. But suppose it had been, suppose it was done yesterday in Great Britain, we have a Constitution which provides exactly what are the powers of this body, what are the powers of the other House, and what are the powers of the Executive, and each branch is independent of the other. The Senate may withhold its assent from a bill passed by the House, the House may withhold its assent from a bill passed by the Senate, and the President has the constitutional right to withhold his assent from any bill passed by the Senate and the House; in which case the Constitution has provided how if the people desire that it should become a law it shall be enacted into a law by the action of both Houses, two-thirds of the bodies acting contrary to the will of the Executive.

I do not know, I do not suppose anybody on the other side pretends to know, what the Executive proposes to do with this bill. I do not believe that there would be any propriety in treating it in the way it has been treated but for the distinct declaration made on the other side that this measure should be attached to an appropriation bill because it could not have been passed in any other way. That at least is the practical effect of what was said; and thus the veto power of the President is to be overcome.

As I recollect, the party that has control of the House and control of the Senate has ever been the advocate of the wisdom of that provision of the Constitution which gives to the President of the United States the power to pass upon every law and to assent or dissent as he saw fit. If I recollect, it has ever been the fundamental principle in the creed of that party that the President of the United States had this power fully and freely, and that it had been given to him as wisely as the power had been given to the House or Senate to assent or dissent from a bill proposed by one body to the other. In 1844 the national convention of the democratic party proclaimed that they disapproved of any efforts to modify the Constitution in that particular. They declared that the veto power was a wise power, and that it had saved the people of the United States from the domination and tyranny of a national bank. They repeated that declaration in 1848, in 1852, and in 1856. I believe it may be said now that within the last thirty days, or sixty days at most, for the first time has been heard from democratic Senators and democratic Members a denunciation of the power of the President in that particular.

A great majority of the presidential vetoes in this country have come from democratic Presidents. Although I am not sufficiently advised to speak accurately, I have no recollection and in my reading I have been unable to find a single veto by a democratic President that did not meet with the approval of the democratic party. I recollect one of the latest vetoes of the last democratic President when he sent a veto to the Senate, in which he said that it was not in the power of this Government under the Constitution to grant to the settlers on the public lands one hundred and sixty acres of land as a homestead; and the democratic Senate, without exception, if I recollect, sustained the veto. They always have done so.

The veto power is a wise provision in the Constitution. It was put there for the purpose of preventing hasty, unwise, and unconstitutional action. The President has the same right and is under the same obligation to express his dissent that any member of this body or of the other has if he should in truth dissent from the bill. Therefore, the question is not presented simply as a question of legislation upon an appropriation bill, but it is accompanied with a threat that the President of the United States must sign this bill, and if he does not sign it, then there shall be no appropriations at all.

The statute sought to be repealed has been upon the statute-book for many years. There has been in the other branch of Congress for a number of years a democratic majority. There was a considerable democratic minority in this body up to the time when it became a majority. Yet no effort has ever been made to repeal the law. Nobody has sought its repeal. Nobody suggested the great danger that was coming to the country from its remaining on the statute-book until very recently. I was astonished when I listened to the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] who concluded a few moments since, that he should have been in public life so long, and that his fellow Senators around him of the same political faith should have been in public service so long, and should have never introduced either here or elsewhere a bill to repeal statutes so odious, so contrary to all the true principles of government, as he declares these statutes to be.

If the legislation were presented in the usual way it would leave it untrammeled. It would be a simple question, then, whether the legislation was wise and whether it was properly passed at the time, or whether it was constitutional at all.

I understand the opposition to this legislation, to the use of the Army at the polls to keep the peace, to the use of supervisors, to the use of deputy marshals, is put upon the ground of the lack of power in the Government of the United States to control the election of members of Congress. That is the point to which we are brought. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] declared that this was a question left to the States. The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] declared that these statutes were unconstitutional. The important question presented to the Senate now is, whether this system of supervision is justified at all by the Constitution, or whether it is not; whether there is any power in the General Government to supervise in any manner the election of Representatives to Congress. If there is none, then of course we are all ready to admit that the statutes should be wiped out, not because they are unnecessary, but because if they lack constitutional authority then of course they are void.

Ordinarily, when a question of this kind is doubted, it has been the custom in this country to go to the courts. We have fixed a tribunal to determine these questions; but I judge from the remarks of the honorable Senator from Indiana that they on the other side are fearful that the court may not take the same view of this subject that they do; and I was quite prepared, after the attack made recently on the power of the Executive, to hear an attack made upon that other department of the Government, the judiciary. I was not at all astonished. If, then, these laws are unconstitutional, it would be very easy to test them in the courts, and if the courts should hold that they were constitutional, then, I suppose, we should all bow to that decision; if the courts should hold, on the contrary, that they were unconstitutional, I suppose, as good citizens, we should bow to that decision.

Now, Mr. President, what is the power of Congress over this question? I know it will be said—and I want to put myself upon the record—it will be said, of course, that we have not conferred the right of suffrage on anybody by the Constitution, neither by the original Constitution nor by the amendments. I bow to the decision of the Supreme Court, and I acknowledge that that is the interpretation to be put upon the Constitution. Therefore I say that the Constitution, neither as originally made nor by its amendments, has conferred the right of suffrage on anybody in this country. I take no issue with the court. Whatever might have been my opinion if the court had left it undecided, I agree that that is the law and I take it and argue it from that basis.

In the first place the General Government assumed in the Constitution to fix the qualifications of voters for Representatives in Congress. If we did not say that they might vote directly, we said that the men who voted for members of Congress should have certain qualifications, and that the States should fix those qualifications; that is, they should have the qualification of electors for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

In another place, section 4 of article 1, the Constitution says:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

The authority in the State to provide for holding elections of this kind is found in the fourth section.

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed." It is the imperative duty, in the first place, of each State to pass laws on this subject. In the early history of the country they did in every State, and Congress passed no laws on the subject for many years, except in the way of apportionment, not as to the manner of holding elections. But Congress reserved to itself the right to alter the State regulations, to annul those regulations, to make other and different regulations whenever in the judgment of Congress it should be necessary to do so.

The authority of Congress, then, over that subject by that reservation is at least as ample as that of the States in the first instance; and if the States could provide for supervising an election for members of Congress, if they could say who should be the judge and who should be the clerk, and what should be the authority of the constable who stood at the ballot-box, or the sheriff of the county, or any other public officer, then Congress must have the same power, for the grant is as broad to Congress as it is to the States, and it is not a State officer that is being elected but a national officer.

I was very much astonished to hear from the other side of the Chamber, on every occasion by every Senator who has addressed us, I believe without exception, the statement that this was a question left by the Constitution to the States, that the General Government had no power or control over it at all. I find that this question was presented not directly but incidentally in a case to the Supreme Court of the United States in 1816. The question was upon the constitutional power of the Government over courts in States, and Judge Story in illustrating the power of the Government over that subject and over other subjects alluded to this; and he was certainly a very safe expounder of constitutional law, and in all my early reading I had supposed it was safe upon all these questions to follow Mr. Justice Story. That case arose in the State of Virginia when the State of Virginia denied the power of the courts of the United States to supervise the findings and judgments of the courts of that State, and when a mandate was issued by the United States Supreme Court refused to obey it. In speaking then upon this subject Judge Story said:

It is imperative upon the State Legislatures to make laws prescribing the time, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives and for electors of President and Vice-President. And in these, as well as some other cases, Congress have a right to revise, amend, or supersede the laws which may be passed by State Legislatures. When, therefore, the States are stripped of some of the highest attributes of sovereignty, and the same are given to the United States, &c.

This appears to have been the opinion of statesmen of both political parties until recently. The idea that the General Government has no control of the question at all is a new departure. I find that in 1856 when there was a republican House and a democratic Senate the democratic Senate believed that the doctrine laid down by Story in 1816 in the case of Martin vs. Hunter (from which I have just read in the first volume of Wheaton's Reports) was the law of the land, for they proceeded to enact a statute entitled "An act to fix the time of holding in the State of Delaware the election of a Representative in the Congress of the United States." It was approved on the 30th of August, 1856; it received the sanction of a democratic President; it received the approval of a democratic Senate. The time was fixed, but not simply the time. It provided that—

The said election shall be conducted in such manner and held at such places as are or may be prescribed by the laws of the said State of Delaware.

Now, I submit that if Delaware had the absolute control of that matter, if the House and the Senate to whom that law was presented and the Executive who signed it had supposed this present theory to be correct, that the State of Delaware had the absolute control, they never would have enacted that the time and the place and the manner should be in accordance with the law of Delaware. Unless Congress might have fixed a different time, a different place from what Delaware had fixed before, this was nonsense. Congress might have fixed a different method and manner of conducting the election if it had seen fit so to do. Otherwise it was folly to add that provision.

Mr. President, I believe that these statutes have received judicial construction in various sections of the country. I believe there is no case adjudicated yet that has denied the right of the General Government to supervise the elections for members of Congress. The case of The United States vs. Rees, decided in ninety-second United States Reports, went off upon the question whether the Government of the United States had a right to supervise a State election, and it was held there by the Supreme Court that no such power existed under the statutes. In the case of Cruikshank, which has been cited repeatedly on this floor heretofore, not much perhaps in this present debate, the question presented was simply whether the indictments were good under the law, and there was nowhere a denial of the right of the General Government to legislate upon the question, and the court expressly declared that upon that subject they did not pass. But in passing upon the matter presented the court did pass broadly upon this very principle. The court declared that where any right was given to a citizen of the United States by the Constitution, or where any right was guaranteed to him by the Constitution, or where any privilege was placed under its protection, that brought him within the purview of the laws that had been enacted, and they declared that while it was not an offense against the United States to disturb a meeting assembled for a lawful purpose, yet if the party who drew the indictment had alleged, in addition to what he did allege, that they had assembled for the purpose of petitioning Congress with respect to a redress of grievances, in that case the Government of the United States would have ample power to protect its citizens and indictments charging that would have been within the law, and if the defendants had disturbed a meeting assembled for that purpose the courts of the United States could have punished such offenders. The court further said that if they assembled for any purpose to exercise any national attribute of citizenship and were disturbed in the exercise of that attribute of citizenship, then the Government of the United States could throw around those people its protection through its courts in the ordinary and legal method.

Unless, then, we are prepared to abandon all control and supervision of the National Government over these matters, it ceases to be a question of constitutional law and becomes a question simply of policy whether we ought to enact laws of this kind. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] said, the other day, that the sixth section of the pending bill was a simple proposition to prevent the President of the United States from interfering with elections over which the United States had no control by the use of the Army; and the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] when opening his remarks the day before yesterday, said:

We are discussing only a plain, simple proposition, which is: Have the representatives of the people of the United States in Congress assembled the right peaceably and in an orderly way to pass a law saying that the State authorities shall have the right to conduct their own elections uncontrolled by United States military interference? Shall they have the right to have honest juries in their jury-boxes untrammeled by test oaths?

That is not the question presented at all. It is the simple question whether the Government of the United States has any control at all over elections for members of Congress, whether the General Government can in any manner supervise those elections, and it is no answer to say that the troops may be used to abuse the people at the polls. The use of the troops at the polls is expressly prohibited and denied except for the purpose of keeping the peace, and the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] said that the only way they could be called to keep the peace was, in his judgment, under that statute by an order from the Executive. If that is so the Executive can only call them, according to the Constitution, on the request of the governor of the State. Then that part of the law at least is harmless, if nothing more. There is more in this than a provision to keep armed soldiers from the polls. It provides that:

No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men—

That is a declaration that if the Government has a right, as I claim it has, to supervise Federal elections by the appointment of marshals at the polls, by the appointment of supervisors at the polls, these men shall be armed with this authority, shall go to the polls without arms, and if there is a riot at the polls they shall not be allowed to call either armed men who are soldiers or armed men who are not soldiers in defense of the peace of the United States, which may be then being broken at the polls.

Mr. President, the object of this repeal, then, is to deprive the United States Government of any supervision or the exercise of any control over elections at all. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] said the other day that this had already been done by what is known as the posse comitatus clause attached to the Army appropriation bill of last year. If that is true, if he is correct in that, then what is the necessity of this legislation; why this heat; why all this excitement? Why now put it upon an appropriation bill and threaten to stop the wheels of Government and to suspend all the operations of the various Departments of the Government, unless the President signs a bill repealing a law which the Senator says has in effect been repealed by a statute enacted about a year ago?

The posse comitatus clause attached to the last Army appropriation bill provided, and provided only, that the President of the United States should use the Army only when authorized so to do either by the Constitution or by the express law of the land. I am one of the few men on our side of the Chamber who gave assent to that doctrine. I believed then, as I believe now, that the use of the Army at the polls is a dangerous use. I believed then, as I believe now, that the use of the Army for the purpose of enforcing civil mandates is a dangerous use; and I believe it is as dangerous to arm a United States marshal who has an execution which he attempts to levy with the power to call the troops as it is to arm a peace officer at the polls with that power. Nobody denies on the other side of the Chamber that when the United States marshal goes out to make a levy in the State of Maryland or Virginia, if he is resisted, he may call the assistance of the people of the county, the posse, and I believe it has been a practice at all times in this country to include in that posse, it certainly was the practice under democratic administrations, as I propose to show, to call into that posse, as part and parcel of it, the Army of the United States. I said a year ago on this floor that it was not in my judgment authorized by the Constitution in its spirit or in its letter; yet until very recently no democratic Senator, no democratic statesman has ever been heard to denounce that as dangerous to the liberties of the people. This sudden fear of the Army has grown out of the fear of protection to a people who are entitled to vote, which right, if not given by the very words of the late amendments, yet was forced out of some States by those amendments. It is now feared they will be allowed to exercise that privilege as they desire. All at once the use of the Army as a posse comitatus has got to be a frightful bugbear. It was not so in 1856.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky who addressed the Senate the other day [Mr. BECK] called attention to the language of Mr. Seward, and he read from a speech made in the Senate in August, 1856, by the great Senator from the State of New York upon this question, and I was struck with the spectacle that the very men who were then contending for this power to use the Army in support of civil writs and to keep the peace without writs in Kansas, are now citing the language of Mr. Seward and claiming that that is an authority and that the cases are analogous. Why, Mr. President, there is no more resemblance between the case presented to the Senate in 1856 upon the question then at issue and the one now before us than there is between the brightest day and the darkest night. What was presented to the Senate then? In Kansas there was a controversy as to the legality of the enactments of the so-called territorial Legislature. It was contended by the House of Representatives by a large majority that the provisions of those laws were contrary to the Constitution of the United States, and in addition to that that they had not been enacted by a legally constituted Legislature of the Territory. It is a well-known and a well-settled principle, contended for always by that side of the Chamber when they have been in power, that the Government of the United States had the right to supervise, to supersede, and to annul every territorial statute that was passed, and it has been claimed further (and the Supreme Court of the United States has laid that down in a recent case as the proper doctrine) that the assent of Congress must be given to territorial statutes to make them legal.

They passed in Kansas before 1856 some most odious statutes. I propose before I get through to call the attention of the Senate to those statutes. It was proposed by the House of Representatives at that time, which was a republican House, that the Army should not be used to enforce those statutes until—what? Until Congress had declared either that they were or were not valid statutes, and that is as far as the House went. There was no attempt to interfere in any other manner with the use of the Army. It was upon that question that Mr. Seward presented the case and made the speech to which the honorable Senator from Kentucky referred. He said these were invalid statutes; he said they were statutes that had never received the assent of the House and Senate; he said they had never been legally passed by the Legislature of Kansas, and that that being so the House had the right to say that the Army should not be used to enforce statutes of doubtful validity and that were outrageous in character. How did the democratic party, at that time the dominant party in the Senate, stand on that question? Not a single democrat voted as Mr. Seward spoke—not one. Now the honorable Senator from Kentucky says that that is good democratic doctrine, and he says the honorable Senator from New York must have foreseen the present attitude. All the democrats then in the Senate voted to sustain those statutes. As the Senator read a portion of the remarks of Mr. Seward, I will read some of them. Mr. Seward said:

> Pretended but invalid laws are enacted by usurpation and enforced by the President of the United States in the Territory of Kansas, with the terror if not with an actual application of the military arm of the Government. At least this is the case assumed by the House of Representatives. The case is altogether a new one. It has not occurred before. It has never even been supposed possible that such a case could happen in a Territory of the United States. The idea has never before entered into the mind of an American statesman that citizens of one State could with armed force enter any other State or Territory and by fraud or force usurp its government and establish a tyranny over its people, much less that a President of the United States would be found to sanction such a subversion of State authority or of Federal authority, and still less that a President thus sanctioning it would employ the standing Army to maintain the odious usurpation and tyranny.

We are very apt to forget the circumstances under which a speech of that kind was made. Let me read a section of a law that was sought to be enforced and that the democratic party in the Senate declared ought to be enforced with the Army. Congress had remitted to the people of Kansas the right to enact their own laws; they had given them an executive and given them courts and given them authority in every particular except as Congress reserved the right to assent or dissent to their laws, and they had enacted these laws as it was claimed. Congress had failed to assent to them. When the test was made in this body, they failed. The test was made in the House, and it was decided in the other House that they were not valid laws. One of the statutes provided:

> No person who is conscientiously opposed to the holding of slaves, or who does not admit the right to hold slaves in this Territory, shall be juror in any cause in which the right to hold any person in slavery is involved, nor in any cause in which any injury done to, or committed by, any slave, is in issue, nor in any criminal proceeding for the violation of any law enacted for the protection of slave property, and for the punishment of crime committed against the right to such property.

When that statute was read by Mr. Seward in his speech there was not found any democratic Senator in this Chamber to rise and denounce it in eloquent language like that we have heard to-day from the Senator from Indiana. That is one of the laws that they intended to enforce with the Army in 1856, and here is another:

> All officers elected or appointed under any existing or subsequently enacted laws of this Territory shall take and subscribe the following oath of office: "I, ——, do solemnly swear, upon the holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that I will support the Constitution of the United States, and that I will support and sustain the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas,' and the provisions of the law of the United States commonly known as the 'fugitive-slave law,' and faithfully and impartially, and to the best of my ability, demean myself in the discharge of my duties in the office of —— ——; so help me God."

Now, I desire to read another section of the statutes sought then to be enforced:

> If any free person, by speaking or by writing, assert or maintain that persons have not the right to hold slaves in this Territory, or shall introduce into this Territory, print, publish, write, circulate, or cause to be introduced into this Territory, written, printed, published, or circulated, in this Territory, any book, paper, magazine, pamphlet, or circular, containing any denial of the right of persons to hold slaves in this Territory, such person shall be deemed guilty of felony, and punished by imprisonment at hard labor for a term of not less than two years.
> If any person print, write, introduce into, publish, or circulate, or cause to be brought into, printed, written, published, or circulated, or shall knowingly aid or assist in bringing into, printing, publishing, or circulating, within this Territory, any book, paper, pamphlet, magazine, handbill, or circular, containing any statements, arguments, opinion, sentiment, doctrine, advice, or innuendo calculated to produce a disorderly, dangerous, or rebellious disaffection among the slaves in this Territory, or to induce such slaves to escape from the service of their masters, or to resist their authority, he shall be guilty of felony, and be punished by imprisonment and hard labor for a term not less than five years.

Mr. Seward proceeded to say with reference to that:

> This statute, sir, if so you insist on calling it, subverts the liberty of the press and the liberty of speech. Where on earth is there a free government where the press is shackled and speech is strangled?

In addition to all this, there was another provision which is too long to read, but it provided that every person who might be convicted of any of the offenses not punishable with death (which of course included these offenses which I have read) should be put into a chain-gang and fastened with a chain of not less than six feet and a ball of certain dimensions, and he should there be compelled to work. Other provisions were equally objectionable in these statutes. Here is one provision, which I will read:

> If any person shall aid or assist in enticing, decoying, or persuading, or carrying away, or sending out of this Territory, any slave belonging to another, with intent to procure or effect the freedom of such slave, or with intent to deprive the owner thereof of the services of such slave, he shall be adjudged guilty of grand larceny, and on conviction thereof shall suffer death, or be imprisoned at hard labor for not less than ten years.

Here is another:

> If any slave shall commit petit larceny, or shall steal any neat cattle, sheep or hog, or be guilty of any misdemeanor, or other offense punishable under the provisions of this act only by fine or imprisonment in a county jail, or by both such fine and imprisonment, he shall, instead of such punishment, be punished, if a male, by stripes on his bare back not exceeding thirty-nine; or, if a female, by imprisonment in a county jail not exceeding twenty-one days, or by stripes not exceeding twenty-one, at the discretion of the justice.

I said that the Army was used in Kansas without protest from the democratic executive or the democratic officials, without protest from the democratic Senators and the democratic Members then in public life. I said they were used with warrant when the officials had warrants, and they were used without warrants. That was the statement made on the floor of the Senate by the Senator from New York and uncontradicted; that is the recollection of every man whose attention was called to the condition of affairs in Kansas in 1855 and 1856. At that time the democratic executive appointed the judges for the new Territories, as the executive does now. He had sent out into that Territory a judge who was rendered most notorious by his cruelties and by his wickedness. And here is one of the charges that he made to a grand jury; and notwithstanding these facts were brought before the Senate, and brought before the President, and brought before the country, no such indignation at the outrages that were being perpetrated on the people filled the minds of Senators as now fills their minds with fear that the troops may be used at the polls, or some supervisor may spy out the iniquities which their political friends desire to practice. Here is the charge:

> This Territory was organized by an act of Congress, and, so far, its authority is from the United States. It has a Legislature elected in pursuance of that organic act. This Legislature, being an instrument of Congress by which it governs the Territory, has passed laws. These laws, therefore, are of United States authority and making; and all that resist these laws, resist the power and authority of the United States, and are therefore guilty of high treason.
> Now, gentlemen, if you find that any persons have resisted these laws, then you must, under your oaths, find bills against such persons for high treason. If you find that no such resistance has been made, but that combinations have been formed for the purpose of resisting them, and individuals of influence and notoriety have been aiding and abetting in such combinations, then must you still find bills for constructive treason, &c.

The Constitution of the United States had declared in explicit terms what treason should be, and yet that is the charge to a jury by a United States judge appointed by the very same party that now works itself into a fury over the supposed dangers from these statutes to which our attention is called. They kept him there and they were in favor of enforcing his edicts and his judgments with the Army of the United States, and it was against that kind of laws and the enforcement of that kind of laws that Mr. Seward was speaking. Mr. Seward said:

> And now what does the provision propose? Simply this: that while it leaves the discretion of the President free exercise to employ the Army where he shall think fit in maintaining Federal laws and, consistently with existing statutes, the laws of every State in the Union, and of every Territory in the Union, he shall not do this one thing: employ that Army in executing the pretended and obnoxious statutes of the usurpation in Kansas.

That is the provision of the appropriation bill of 1856; and if the honorable Senator from Kentucky who read it can make anything out of it—if he can find any comfort in that effort to sustain his friends in their course now, he must have read it with less care, I think, than he usually does.

Now, Mr. President, what is the proposition? I said before it is simply to strip the General Government of all power over its elections, to remit to the States the privilege of having a free election or a fraudulent election, declare to every State in the Union that it is a matter of entire unconcern to the General Government whether the ballot is free and fair or whether it is not free and fair. In all this discussion I have noticed that those who claim to speak for the democratic party on this floor—and I believe it is so elsewhere—have assumed to be the champions of a free ballot. They have assumed here that it was a constitutional right to have a free ballot, and that we on this side of the Chamber denied it. Have we ever denied it, Mr. President? We are in favor of a free ballot and a fair ballot. We believe that it is the duty of the Government to supervise and control these elections if it is necessary to have a free and a fair ballot. And I say this does not come with a very good grace from a political party that has been connected with all the prominent and striking frauds of the age. All the great frauds upon the ballot that have startled the public mind for the last thirty years have emanated in that party and have been for its benefit and its advantage, and it never has repudiated these frauds that I am aware of or the benefits that they have derived from these fraudulent elections. There are some people who can remember, perhaps, the fraudulent voting in Kansas between 1854 and 1856. They can remember whole regiments of men from neighboring States who were violating the rights of the people, upheld and supported by the party then in power. There are a great many people who have not forgotten the election in 1844 in the State of Louisiana, which caused great scandal at that time and subsequently in this country. It was laid at the door of the democratic party that profited by it and had the advantage of it; and none of us have forgotten the frauds in New York City in 1868. We have not forgotten the frauds of a later period in some of the Southern States.

The honorable Senator from Alabama who spoke briefly this morning [Mr. MORGAN] said that he regretted that it was necessary to bring the South so prominently forward, or that it had been thought so. I disclaim any desire to prominently or unfairly present the South in this case, but in looking over this question to determine whether it is necessary for the Government to exercise this just supervision we must see whether there is a condition of affairs in any part of the country that prevents a free and a fair ballot, and if it is on the election of a United States officer and the State denies to the people who are entitled to vote a free and a fair ballot, then it is the duty of the United States, if the Government has the power, to see that they have a free and a fair ballot.

Mr. President, it was my duty, by order of this body, to go into some of the Southern States and take testimony. We have embodied that in two volumes which have been presented to the Senate. I am not going over in detail what we found in those States, but I can simply say that in the State of Louisiana it was demonstrated in every parish that we examined with reference to that there had been neither a free nor a fair ballot.

Mr. MORGAN. Did I understand the Senator to say that that report had been made to the Senate?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly it has been.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not seen it.

Mr. TELLER. It was made at the last session.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator speaks of a report made at the last session?

Mr. TELLER. Yes, sir. The proof presented to this committee did not rest upon the evidence of unlearned and illiterate men; it was not confined to the men who had formerly been slaves; but the most respectable people of the State of Louisiana, men who were in full sympathy with the efforts of the southern confederacy, men who had held high positions in the confederate army, were before the committee and testified freely and frankly that in their section of country there had been neither a free nor a fair ballot, that intimidation and fraud had been practiced on the voters, intimidation before the election and fraud after the ballots were cast, and in every parish that we examined into we found this to be the condition of affairs. On some occasion when I have more time I may present this more in detail. I desire now simply to allude to it in a general way. I am justified in doing so because there can be no question about the proof that we produce. It is not one of those doubtful questions that are sometimes presented.

The evidence of the governor of the State of Louisiana through his annual message is on file here showing that at least in one parish murders and crimes of a heinous character were committed in the interest of the political party now in control of this Senate, and I have not yet heard anybody talking about protection of the ballot in Louisiana; I have not heard anybody talking about protection of the ballot against the rifle clubs that paraded through the parish of Tensas headed by a democratic candidate for Congress, headed part of the time by a democratic candidate for the Legislature, spreading terror through the country; and it is in proof in this report that a democratic candidate for the Legislature declared that with the common run of negroes you could frighten them by slinging a musket over your shoulder so that they would not vote, but that with a certain other class you had to kill them in order to deter them from exercising the privilege of voting!

This report has been before the Senate now for some considerable time, and I have yet to hear the first man on that side of the Chamber either dispute what has been there reported or condemn the conduct of those men. A free and a fair ballot! There can be no free ballot and no fair ballot when the people are not allowed to assemble and nominate candidates for public office, when they are not permitted to put a candidate for member of Congress of their political faith in the field, and that is the case in Louisiana when the member of Congress that was nominated secretly was hunted from his home and driven out of the State by men in the interest of this same party, as it is admitted by the governor in his annual message; and yet they tell us that they want a free and a fair ballot!

The proof is not by colored men now, not by republicans, but by white democrats, that the parish of Tensas, a parish largely republican, with seventeen thousand colored people and fourteen hundred white, for ten days before the election was raided, and that part of the time, as I before said, the raiding parties were headed by the democratic candidate for Congress, and part of the time by the democratic candidate for member of the Legislature, and the crimes that were committed by these armed bands were testified to by these white men and by these democrats before this committee. One man who had been a colonel in the confederate army, who swore that he was a democrat and had always been a democrat, a man of character, said they came with these raiding parties into his neighborhood; and he said, "I knew that they came for political purposes, and I assembled my neighbors, my friends, and we served a written notice on them that if they did not go back we would fight." When I asked him afterward, "Would you have fought?" He said, "Most assuredly."

The voice of the people of that parish was so stifled that the republican candidate for Congress never received a single vote. Yet he was a man of character and a man of the same color with the great majority of voters in that parish. The history of that parish is the history of other parishes of that State. None of these men who are now so excited over the dangers to the ballot-box have been heard either in Louisiana or here or elsewhere to denounce these outrages against the people and against their right to assemble and to vote. There are other rights probably equally sacred with the ballot, but that right lies at the foundation of all. If you deprive the citizen of his opportunity to freely and fairly vote, then I admit that all the evils predicted from bad legislation and from standing armies may follow. But to-day in the State of Louisiana more than one-half of its voting population are denied the free ballot.

Mr. JONAS. Will the honorable Senator permit me to ask him where he gets his information?

Mr. TELLER. I will tell the honorable Senator where I get the information.

Mr. JONAS. I should like to ask the honorable Senator, with his permission, whether he bases his statement upon the report made by the Teller committee?

Mr. TELLER. I will reply to the gentleman on that subject. I am not basing my statement upon that report; I am basing it upon the evidence that was taken before that committee, and I am basing it upon the observation that I made in the State. I am basing it upon evidence that was produced which cannot be controverted or denied. I do not say that is the case in every parish, but I do say that in every parish from which we swore witnesses we found substantially the same condition of affairs.

Mr. JONAS. Is the Senator aware that indictments were found in the United States court based upon the evidence obtained before his committee, and that those indictments have been tried before a packed jury in the United States court upon the evidence of some witness who appeared before his committee, and that even that jury have acquitted the parties charged upon the evidence procured by his committee? Such is the fact.

Mr. TELLER. I must insist that the gentleman shall allow me to go on, as it is late, and when I get through I will answer any question that the gentleman desires to ask me. I am aware that certain persons were arrested in certain parts of the State, up in the Red River country or near there. I am aware that they were tried, not by a packed jury, although it is possible the jury might have been packed in their interest, but I will take the testimony of the democratic member of the Legislature from that country, and with any impartial jury, with any jury not surrounded by the influences that surround a jury in that country, with any fair-minded jury, I believe I can convict the party and his associates of the crime with which they were charged. I will take the testimony that they offered and not the testimony that we obtained. It only shows, then, a greater necessity for governmental supervision over these elections in the South, or in that immediate section of the South at least. We examined one other State, and there is not any question, there is not any dispute as to the condition of affairs there. I do not suppose that anybody will dispute the facts that I will state. We went to the city of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, charged with an investigation into the affairs there with reference to this very question of the freedom and the fairness of the ballot, and I do not know but we found quite as much freedom of the ballot as will be desired from any source and by anybody, but not much fairness. The county of Charleston had in 1876 a majority of something over six thousand republicans. There is no reason to suppose that that majority had materially decreased, and yet at the last election held in that county the democratic majority was seven hundred and some odd, which would, of course, show a change in the public sentiment, if it represented the public sentiment, of something like seven thousand votes. There were in the county of Charleston originally fifty-five voting places. The Legislature of the State of South Carolina, in keeping, as I think, with the policy of the white people, reduced these fifty-five precincts to thirty-two. It was claimed that this was done to prevent repeating at the polls; nevertheless the proof shows that before this reduction a majority of the men who went to the polls traveled from eight to twelve miles. Since that time, under the present law, every man who goes to vote in certain sections must necessarily travel, going and coming, from twenty-five to forty miles.

The testimony of a democrat before the committee shows that the bill was introduced into the Legislature of South Carolina; that it met some opposition in the senate; that it went back to the house and came again to the senate, and that it was supported by the principal democratic officer of the democratic committee of the State. It was in proof that the chairman of the democratic county committee of Charleston said, when the bill was before the Legislature, (and it is in proof by a white man and by a democrat, mind you, a responsible and a respectable man,) "If you will give me this law, and if the governor will give me the commissioners, I will overcome the majority of six thousand in the county of Charleston." He got the law, and the result I think will justify us in the conclusion that he got the commissioners. This consolidation of polls was not for the purpose of preventing repeating at the polls, but for the purpose, I say, of preventing the colored people from voting, to render it impossible for them to get to the polls. They are poor and many of them without the means of locomotion except as they would walk.

A free and fair ballot when the voter gets to the polls is desirable, but it is equally as desirable that he should have an opportunity to get to the polls, and it is as equally destructive of good government to deny him the privilege of visiting the polls as it is to deny him the privilege of voting when he gets to the polls. This consolidation, as I understand from the testimony, took place all over the State. It was more noticeable in Charleston perhaps than in any other county. These people lately enfranchised, jealous of their right to vote, anxious to vote as no other class of men are anxious to vote, prizing their privilege as no other people prize their privilege to vote, and enduring sacrifices for the privilege of voting that no men under the sun have ever undergone, both in Louisiana, as shown by the testimony, and in South Carolina, came up to vote, traveling twenty and thirty miles to vote, and in many instances they were not allowed to vote. Their names could not be found on the register's lists, or there was not time, and in many places it was a physical impossibility to allow the number of voters who were at the polls to vote. The testimony, uncontradicted and undisputed, shows that they went from poll to poll and, in the language of a witness, they begged to vote. The party of the advocates of free ballot on this floor sitting on the other side, for that was the party in control of the ballot-boxes, denied to them the privilege of voting, for which they were begging. They assembled at the United States court-house. They have a lingering notion that the Government of the United States is their friend. They have yet a notion that citizenship means something more than a bare name. They went where the Government officers were and laid their case before them. The United States marshal went out. He said he traveled around from poll to poll to see what was the trouble, and that they told these people that they must go before a trial justice and make an affidavit, and he said, "I found the office of every trial justice in the city of Charleston closed," so that there was no opportunity for these men to comply with such a requirement, which was not authorized by the law. They had no right to send them away from the polls, and the marshal said the yard of the United States court-house held at least five hundred of these men who were denied the privilege of a free ballot.

That might be taken as the history of other counties in that State. It might be taken as the history of the county in which the capitol of the State stands. Notwithstanding all the pledges that have been made by high officials of that State, that the people high and low should be treated with fairness and that all the rights of citizenship should be guaranteed to them, these frauds upon the people and upon the ballot-box were perpetrated in the city, the capital of the State. Not only were they prevented from voting, but in some places these democratic officials declined to open the ballot-boxes at all. Eight or nine hundred men assembled at one voting place, too far away to go to another poll on election day. It had been arranged that they should not have an opportunity to vote, and at this place the democratic officials declined to open the ballot-box, and they did not have the opportunity to vote at all.

In another county out from Charleston this same system of depriving these people of an opportunity to have their votes counted was carried on. The democratic officials called the voters together, and they took a buscuit-box instead of a ballot-box. The voters, ignorant colored men, voted all day, to the extent of eight or nine hundred, and deposited their votes for the republican candidates, and when these advocates of free ballot had concluded the count they sat down and entered a protest to the democratic officials of the county against the counting of that vote because these votes had been deposited in a buscuit-box, and the democratic officials of that county threw out the vote because it had not been cast in a ballot-box.

Not only were the people in that State prevented from voting, but when through obstacles they had got to the boxes and voted, when they had traveled long distances and had braved all sorts of ill-treatment and deposited their ballots, then these officials nullified their votes. How was it done? By means of tissue ballots, a little ballot about two inches long and about an inch and three-quarters wide, and in Charleston County containing the names of seventeen members of the Legislature, of the State officers, and the candidate for Congress printed on the finest possible paper, so that in bulk it would take a dozen of them, perhaps, to make the ordinary ballot. When the ballot-boxes were opened in various sections of the city of Charleston and in other counties as well, notwithstanding the provision of the supervisors and the supervision of the marshals, of which so much complaint is made, the boxes were found to contain in many instances more tissue ballots in addition to the regular ballots than there were voters at the polls. In the city of Charleston there were at least five thousand of these tissue ballots, as sworn to by the chairman of the democratic committee before our committee. He said that probably there were fully five thousand of them used. They were used at every poll in the county of Charleston but two or three, and they were used in other counties, as I said before.

Now, Mr. President, I want to explain exactly how this thing was done. I do not know how these tissue ballots got in those boxes except in one or two cases; we could not prove it. They were rarely seen at the polls. We proved that there were, say, five hundred names of voters at the ballot-box, and there would be twelve hundred tickets in the box, of which half of them, or generally the excess, were these tissue ballots; but when they were drawn out under the statute, these tissue ballots were not drawn, but the republican tickets being stiff and heavy and readily felt by the touch were almost invariably drawn out. A subcommittee appointed by the committee of which I was then the chairman examined the ballot-boxes. We examined every box except two, and we found in those boxes thirty-eight hundred tissue democratic tickets. We found two boxes where large votes had been cast in which there were no ballots of any kind. At the Palmetto engine-house, where it was claimed that 3,569 votes had been cast, there were no ballots in the box at all. The testimony shows that up to half past three o'clock 915 votes had been cast at this poll. The deputy marshals and supervisor were driven from the poll. At this time the ballot-boxes were closed at six o'clock, and the ballots were counted and the tissue ballots and the other ballots enumerated 3,569 votes. Thus there must have been 2,654 votes cast in two hours and a half. If that was an honest vote, they had cast 2,654 votes, or more than 17 votes in a minute; and as by law they are compelled in South Carolina to swear every man who votes, it was a physical impossibility to cast that number; and yet those votes were all counted for the democratic candidate, except 416 for the republican candidate.

In another precinct in that county six hundred and twenty names were on the poll-list, and something like eleven or twelve hundred tickets were in the box. There were five hundred and nineteen republican tickets in the box and one hundred and one democratic tickets, making six hundred and twenty. By this process of purifying the ballot-box, by drawing out, when they got through they drew out of these tickets until one hundred and forty-seven republican tickets only were left, and there was a large democratic majority declared in that precinct. The fact of these ballots being there was not disputed by anybody. It is a notable fact that that fraud was charged in the city of Charleston upon all the managers of election with one exception, and not a single manager appeared before the committee to exonerate himself or his party from the charge. It was in proof that a democratic officer, not of the county but of the political organization, sat delibrately down at one place and put these democratic tissue tickets in the box, and yet he never came before the committee to deny the charge, and it remains undenied to this day.

It is a good thing to talk about a free ballot; and I am not certain but that when some people outside of this Chamber talk of a free ballot they mean just that kind of a ballot. I am greatly impressed by my observation of the method of conducting elections in some sections of the country with the belief that the howl for a free ballot, the howl that has gone up from certain sources against the exercise of the power of supervision by the National Government, means simply that they want an opportunity to commit these frauds without danger of the strong hand of the Federal law. It ill befits and it ill becomes gentlemen who have no condemnation for this system of fraud, for this system of electioneering and of carrying elections, to stand up on the other side of the Chamber and charge on us a desire to override the people and to deprive them of the free exercise of their rights at the ballot-box.

Mr. President, these laws were put on the statute-book for the express purpose of protecting the voter in his right at the polls, and there never will be a free and a fair ballot in a large proportion of this country if these laws are repealed. I do not say that simply with reference to the South, for it is equally true with reference to Northern States that I could name. In the great city of New York there will be no freedom of election and no fair ballot-box without some provision of Federal authority. It is said that there have been great and grave outrages perpetrated in the city of New York. There is a statute in New York which authorizes any man who has suffered at the hands of John Davenport to go into the courts and obtain redress. If Mr. Davenport has violated the rights of any citizen of that State there is a State law which provides that he shall be punished, and the courts are in sympathy with the dominant party here in the city of New York. The officials are in political sympathy with the people in that city who complain that they have been outraged by the conduct of Government officials. That is not the case in the South, Mr. President. All the offices there are filled by men who have no sympathy with the class of men who are appealing to the General Government for protection at the ballot-box. They have no sympathy with the men who traveled up and down the city of Charleston begging the privilege of exercising the right of American citizenship freely and fairly. With all the offices in the hands of the dominant party in the Senate, with all the courts at their command, and with the State government, these men are without any remedy unless they get it through this body and the other with the help of the Executive. They must have national protection or they will have no protection at all.

Mr. President, we never can redress the wrongs and the injuries heaped upon this people in the South. It will be utterly impossible to do it. We cannot expect it; we cannot hope for it; but the General Government has some rights which I am opposed to surrendering. I am opposed to surrendering the right to supervise the ballot and providing that the men who come here to sit in the Halls of Congress shall come by the votes of the people fairly and honestly cast. I do not believe that in certain sections of the South there ever will be a free and fair ballot if we surrender this right, and I am determined with my vote that it shall not be surrendered. I do not know what the Executive may do. He may think it is worth while, in order to procure the money to pay the Army and to pay the judges and to pay the officers, to surrender a principle so important, so useful, and so necessary; but no threat of starvation of the Government, no intimidation of that kind will, in my judgment, affect either the Executive or the members of the Senate who sit on this side of the Chamber. If it is right that the Government should have this power the necessity cannot be denied; if it is not right, the courts are open for the men who think they have been wronged to go there and have that question determined.

If you repeal these laws, then these poor men of the South, these voters, will have no protection. It is not always the case that the negro alone is threatened and driven from the polls; in many sections it is the white man as well as the black man. We have the right, and the people who live in every section of the country have the right, to insist that the men who come here to make laws which we are compelled to obey shall come in a constitutional and a legal manner. That never will be done if we surrender now the Federal control of the ballot-box in the election of members of the National Legislature. That is all we claim. We claim no right to supervise the State election under these laws; we are not asking that. The fight is not made here to get rid of supervision in a State election, but to get rid of the supervision of the national election for the national officers who legislate at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, what is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COKE in the chair.) The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to the sixth section of the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Cannot we vote on that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York wish the amendment reported?

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir; I remember it very well. I am ready to vote on it for one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.,) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 17, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SUBSIDIARY SILVER COIN.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour will now commence at ten minutes past twelve o'clock, and the House will resume the consideration of the bill pending at the close of the morning hour yesterday, being the bill (H. R. No. 4) to provide for the interchange of subsidiary coins for legal-tender money under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal-tender in all sums not exceeding $10.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask that that bill be again read for information.

The bill was read.

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not know, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PRICE. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to inquire when the proper time will be to make a motion to refer this bill?

The SPEAKER. When the bill has been read a second time. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] will allow the motion to refer to be made.

Mr. STEPHENS. I said yesterday that at the proper time I should not object to a motion to refer this bill. But upon the question of reference I have something to say and will say it now.

The SPEAKER. The bill had better be read a second time, when the motion to refer will be in order.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let the bill be read, then.

The bill was then read the second time.

Mr. STEPHENS. What is the object of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] in desiring to have this bill referred to another committee I do not well understand. This bill is a short one; it is before the House; it is immaterial how it got here, so far as its merits are concerned. It is now before the House. What is the object of a reference? Does the gentleman wish to perfect the bill? He can do it now, when the bill is before the House, as well as if the bill was before his committee.

As remarked yesterday by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] this is a bill which a large number of his own constituents and of business men all over the country are anxious should be passed. The bill has passed the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures unanimously. Why, then, should it be referred to another committee? If I understand the object of the gentleman, it is because this bill embraces subject-matter with which the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures are not properly charged, and which belongs legitimately to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Upon that question I have this to say: that point was decided between the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] and myself at the last Congress; the precedent was then set. The gentleman then raised the question that a bill kindred to this did not belong to the Coinage Committee, and he moved that it be referred to his committee—the Committee on Banking and Currency. The question was submitted to this House, and by a large vote the subject-matter was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

I maintained then and I maintain now that the Coinage Committee is the only committee that can rightfully, under the rules, be charged with this subject.

The Constitution of the United States declares that Congress shall have power to coin money and regulate the value thereof. The Committee on Coinage was appointed to execute that power of Congress, or rather to take charge of all matters in execution of that power. This bill proposes to regulate the relative value of subsidiary silver coin and paper currency. No other committee of this House has rightful jurisdiction over bills regulating the value of money. It is appointed to take charge of all matters pertaining to the execution of that power of Congress. This subject therefore rightfully belongs to that committee, and I am willing for the House to decide that question.

Some gentleman said yesterday that this measure had nothing in it about coinage, weights, and measures. Sir, the whole subject of the bill relates to coinage, subsidiary coinage, and its relative value with other kinds of money; its interchangeability with United States notes and other kinds of legal-tender money.

In regard to the Committee on Banking and Currency, (I mean no reflection upon that committee at all; its duties are high, are important,) I will say only a few words. Currency and banking have a significant and specific meaning. In this country currency means paper money, United States notes, bank-notes, and fractional currency. The coinage department of this Government and the currency department are two distinct departments in the Treasury. You have a Comptroller of Currency, who has charge of that subject, while coinage and the value of coins belong to the department of the Mint.

So with the Committee on Banking and Currency of this House; its duty is to take charge of all matters relating to banking and currency. But all matters relating to coinage, the coining of money and the regulation of the value of the money so coined, belongs to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, where, by a large vote of the House last year, it was decided such matters should go.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] said that when he presented this petition at the last Congress it was sent to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures by a large vote. I do not remember the fact myself; but the gentleman stated yesterday, and he doubtless recollects it very well, that by a vote of this House in the last Congress the identical petition on which this bill is reported was sent to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. I know it was sent there; he says it was sent there by a vote of this House. Will this House recede from the position it then took? Is there any reason why it should? I have no objection, as I stated yesterday, to having the gentleman's motion decided by a vote of the House; but I repeat, why should the bill be referred to his committee? I do not care how the bill came here. It is now before the House for consideration; and what object can there be in referring it except to postpone action? Does the bill need amendment? Then let the gentleman move his amendments. Why delay action? Because, as the gentleman says, the bill did not come here rightfully? Upon that point I rely upon the decision of the Speaker, that it did come here rightfully; that it was introduced properly. But suppose I had risen in my place, representing no committee, and had asked to introduce this identical bill; suppose no objection had been offered, and the bill was before the House, would the gentleman move to refer the bill to a committee unless he wanted to amend it? And if he wants to amend this bill let him make his motion. Now is the time to consider the measure. All the business men of this country from the far West and the North and the South and the East are petitioning for the passage of a bill similar to this. Let us go on and act upon the bill, amending it if necessary; but let us not delay action by referring it to any committee.

I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] if he wishes to say anything.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to make a motion to have this bill printed and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I am frank to say, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] that so far as I understand this bill (and I believe I understand it) I think there will be no difficulty with myself or anybody else in voting for it. I think it is a bill that is needed by the country, and one that ought to become a law.

I will state that one object I have in meeting at the threshold, in the very opening of this Congress, the question which arises here is to make a test question. So far as this case is concerned it probably is an unfortunate case for that purpose, for the reason that, so far as I know, there is no objection to the bill; and the Committee on Banking and Currency in all likelihood would be as willing as the committee of which the gentleman from Georgia is chairman to report it and have it passed at an early day. The subject was considered by the committee of which I had the honor to be chairman in the last Congress, and we were anxious for an opportunity to present some such bill to the House for consideration.

The gentleman says with truth that upon this very question perhaps, or some cognate question, the House determined to refer this and other questions connected with the currency to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. It is to that point I desire to direct the minds of members, because if that committee can take jurisdiction of the questions embraced in this bill there is no subject connected with the currency where currency is also concerned of which it cannot as well take jurisdiction—none of which I can conceive.

My friend from Georgia speaks of the power of Congress "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." He ought to have gone further and quoted the entire provision, which ends with the words "and to fix the standard of weights and measures." The name of that committee—"Coinage, Weights, and Measures"—indicates the jurisdiction that the rules intended it should have, not embracing any question of the currency or the functions of any coinage for the purposes of currency.

I do not know that other gentlemen are as familiar with this question as I am, but it is important that even a bill of this sort should be printed, that members may see what they are doing when they vote for or against it.

The question now presented is important not only with reference to this bill, but in regard to other measures that have been sent to this committee. There is the whole question of the silver dollar. That, as I understand, has been referred in a similar way to this committee, bringing up the question to what extent the silver dollar shall be currency, what are its functions. There, sir, is the dividing line between these two committees. As the Speaker said yesterday, there is nothing in the provisions of this bill with reference to the circulation of subsidiary coinage as currency that could give jurisdiction to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. I am free to admit, by way of illustration, that if a bill were introduced providing for a new subsidiary coin—a ten-cent piece, a twenty-five-cent piece, or a seventy-five-cent piece, whether of silver, of nickel, or of gold—that committee, having once obtained jurisdiction of the subject for the purpose of fixing the forms, device, and value of the coin, might decide what should be its functions, what should be its currency quality. But when the question is as to the circulation of coinage already fixed—the nickel, the twenty-five-cent piece, or the half-dollar subsidiary coinage, which are already regulated by law—has that committee jurisdiction to report any bill fixing the functions of such coinage, saying for how much it shall be legal tender and under what circumstances it shall be exchanged at the Treasury Department for paper currency? I say that such a question is beyond the jurisdiction of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and belongs properly to the Committee on Banking and Currency, for when a particular species of coinage is once established, then the question as to its capacities and functions belongs to the Currency Committee; and the whole of our coinage is included in the term "currency" in the ordinary acceptation of the word.

Mr. STEPHENS. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. BUCKNER] in his argument for the jurisdiction of that committee in respect to this bill. When I presented the petition on this subject, as I said yesterday, I asked, according to my recollection, that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. A proposition was made to refer it to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and, being very desirous that in some way the measure should be presented to the House and passed, I made no objection. But I have never been able to see what the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures can possibly have to do with a bill which proposes to redeem the subsidiary coin in legal-tender paper money. The truth is, in regard to this measure and my relations to it, that in the name and on behalf of my constituents, which in this respect include two millions of population, I ask this House of Representatives will at the earliest moment do this simple act of justice. This subsidiary coin is daily sold in Wall street at a discount of 2 or 3 per cent. by people who cannot afford it; and it is a disgrace—I say it, measuring my words—it is a disgrace to the Congress of the United States that year after year this state of things should be permitted to exist.

Now, sir, I think it important that the amendment of the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency should prevail as settling the jurisdiction at the beginning of this Forty-sixth Congress. I believe the bill might just as well have been referred to the Judiciary Committee as to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. But the bill is before the House, and if the proposition amended by the gentleman who has the honor of presiding over the Committee of Banking and Currency shall not prevail, then, in the name of justice and right, I ask it may be passed by a unanimous vote. And I undertake to say, upon my honor, there is not one member in this House who, understanding the case as I understand it, would vote against it.

Mr. CLAFLIN. The gentleman from New York as well as the gentleman from Missouri makes complaint that this bill has been referred improperly to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. To my mind there is nothing more appropriate to the duties of that committee. What has the Committee on Banking and Currency to do with the coinage or with weights and measures? It is simply a committee for banks and for currency relating to banks, and not for the currency of the United States or United States notes. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has charge of the coinage of the country in all its branches.

However that may be, Mr. Speaker, let me come to the next point. Is there any objection to the bill itself? It is admitted that it will certainly cure a great evil now existing. It places subsidiary coins of the United States upon the principle of redemption. Our notes are placed on the principle of redemption, and there is no reason why the subsidiary coins of the United States should occupy any different position. This bill provides for the redemption of the subsidiary coins of the United States. It puts them on a par with paper money.

We have two currencies, paper money and subsidiary coins, and as the law is at present subsidiary coins, not being redeemable in paper money, suffer a depreciation of value, making them less convenient for the business of to-day. The great evil is that subsidiary coins are not redeemable, and people fear when they take them that they will suffer loss, and whenever a man gets $5 of those coins in his pocket he runs at once to some bank or some merchant and gets rid of them. When you make subsidiary coins interchangeable with legal-tender paper money, you at once relieve the people of that fear and then subsidiary coins will circulate naturally, and what the country wants the country will have. I see, therefore, no objection in any point of view to the pending bill. It places these subsidiary coins on a par with every other portion of the currency of the country, making them redeemable in legal-tender paper money.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, admitting all that the gentleman from Massachusetts has just stated in reference to the interchangeability of subsidiary coins and legal-tender paper money and the necessity and advisability of it, it has nothing whatever to do with the question of reference. If any gentleman will take the bill now pending and look at it he will see it has two cardinal and material defects. In the first place, it makes provision for this redemption of all subsidiary coins, and I presume it is a fair inference from that to say that it includes copper coins as subsidiary coins, and the framers of the bill and the indorsers of the bill, it must be taken for granted, meant that copper coins also should be included.

Mr. STEPHENS. Copper coins are only token-money.

Mr. PRICE. It is, Mr. Speaker, in the first place liable to that objection. Another objection is that in the last section of the last paragraph of the bill, whichever it may be——

Mr. STEPHENS. The last section.

Mr. PRICE. I have not looked particularly at that part of the bill, but in the last part of it the bill is fairly open to the construction that when these subsidiary coins are redeemed they are never again to be reissued. I do not know that that is the intention of the framers of the bill. I do not know that a legal tribunal would so decide, but I do know that it is susceptible of that interpretation. Would it not be better, therefore, to frame the bill so as to avoid all these misconstructions, if they be misconstructions?

Now in reference to the proper committee to which this should go I do not propose to place myself in the category of gentlemen who are fighting for business for their committees; but if this does not belong to the Committee on Banking and Currency, then I suggest the propriety of abolishing that committee altogether.

As the gentleman from Georgia very properly and truly said, it is all currency—subsidiary coins are currency and paper promises to pay are currency. All there is in the bill is the interchangeability of the coin for currency and currency for coin. There is no coinage in it, by implication or otherwise. The gentleman from Georgia quotes the Constitution of the United States, and I have been amused to see the Constitution of the United States lugged in here upon every possible case. The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall have the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, the gentleman from Georgia says. That is admitted; nobody calls in question that statement, but this bill does not propose to coin any money, and if it did, the Constitution of the United States in no place that I know of says anything about referring that to the Coinage, Weights, and Measures Committee. So that looking at it from any point of view, I think it will be agreed on all hands there is no constitutional objection to referring this to the Committee on Banking and Currency. If subsidiary coin are currency and paper promises to pay—for there is no such thing as paper money—are currency, then it is all currency, and the Committee on Banking and Currency is the proper committee to have the bill go to to be perfected. And for the information of members the bill ought to be printed that gentlemen may know what they are voting on.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question. Is there anything in the Constitution of the United States providing for the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. PRICE. I am sorry my friend did not understand me. I only referred to the Constitution of the United States for the purpose of showing the lack of necessity—to put it in my way—of lugging the Constitution into this question at all.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have here the authorities to which I alluded. Last year this identical question was raised upon a kindred bill and after a discussion, which will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last session, November 3, there were one hundred and twenty-six members who voted to refer the measure to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and thirty-four who voted against that reference. Now, sir, I want this bill acted on, and I move the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that on yesterday he inadvertently misstated the position of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] who originally presented this petition, in saying that he appeared to have thought at the time the reference was properly made. Subsequent information shows that this petition went to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures of last Congress by a vote of the House, and the weight of the reference is strengthened, relatively as the wish of a single member bears to the judgment of a majority of the House.

Mr. HASKELL and Mr. GARFIELD rose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to allow me to offer a suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] has been recognized. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HASKELL. I rise for a parliamentary question. I desire to ask if the gentleman from Georgia has moved the previous question on the motion to commit, or on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The previous question is moved on the motion to commit, not on the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I thought it was on the bill. I have now no suggestion to offer.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has this bill been read a second time?

The SPEAKER. It has.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. STEPHENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, that this bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and that it be printed.

The question being put, there were—ayes 88, noes 97.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS. Now I ask the House to consider the bill by sections, and let each gentleman vote for whatever part he chooses.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire the bill to be open to amendment by sections?

Mr. STEPHENS. I prefer myself the bill just as it is.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. STEPHENS. I want a vote to-day.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour expires in twenty-five minutes. This bill, however, will go over from day to day in the morning hour.

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not wish to cut off debate at all. On the merits of the bill I have this to say: the committee made two alterations in the bill introduced by Senator BOOTH to which the petition referred. That bill provided that the subsidiary coins should be exchanged for legal-tender notes. The committee made it legal-tender money.

One section, the third, provides for the redemption of the subsidiary coins in legal-tender money when presented in sums of $10 or any multiple thereof. I know there are some gentlemen in this House who are opposed to increasing the amount at which the subsidiary coins shall be a legal tender. By law it is now $5. My own opinion is that it ought to be $20, for the reason that many persons are unable to pay their internal taxes with it. They have to pay sums of $7, $10, or $15, and they cannot pay this tax with coin bearing the stamp of the Government upon it. My opinion is that it is a cheat and a fraud upon the labor of the country. The Government ought not to put forth money by which the poor men—the laborers—of the country are liable to be so imposed upon.

Now, sir, I wish to state to the House that in the last Congress on this identical proposition we had the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Sherman, before our committee. He was examined before the committee. He saw the evils of the existing law. You will find his answers to the questions put to him in the report of the committee, I think Miscellaneous Document No. 26 or 27, the exact number I do not recollect. He agreed that it would be wise to put the amount at $20 or any multiple thereof. The committee so reported that bill. It passed this House by a two-thirds vote. It went to the Senate and it remains there to this day unacted upon. It was not reached.

This bill makes the amount $10. That does not at all violate the principle sanctioned by the Secretary himself last year. Therefore I am in favor of the bill remaining as the committee have reported it, but when I move the previous question I am willing that each section shall be voted on separately.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia to be: that this bill shall be considered by sections and open to amendment; that it shall be by unanimous consent agreed that debate shall be under the five-minute rule, as in Committee of the Whole. If there be no objection to that understanding the Chair will be governed by it.

No objection was made.

Mr. STEPHENS. An amendment should be made to the title.

The SPEAKER. That will come up when the bill is disposed of.

Mr. HASKELL. Is the bill now properly before the House for discussion?

The SPEAKER. It is upon its merits.

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to say a few words. I am entirely in favor of making the subsidiary silver coins of the United States a legal tender for a larger sum than is now provided for by law. I am not in favor of providing for the redemption of these subsidiary silver coins into the greenback currency of the United States in the sums specified in this bill.

On these two propositions I desire simply to say this: that it is a great economic principle well understood by all writers upon political economy that the poor people of a country are better off in proportion as they have a larger amount of the subsidiary or small coins of the nation in circulation. I desire to see the largest possible circulation of the subsidiary coins of the United States.

I understand that to-day there is a plethora of the subsidiary coins of the United States only in the banks and among the brokers and shop-keepers in the larger towns of the United States, and as it stands, then, to-day and under the present law every banker, every broker, every shop-keeper is an active distributor of the subsidiary coins. The banker cannot be annoyed with the great bulk of their accumulation, and he consequently pushes them out among the people. Whenever they are received in large quantities he instructs his clerks, his cashier, or his teller to dispose of them in current payments just as fast as they can, in order to prevent the cumbersome accumulation of coin in the vaults of his bank. The result of this work on the part of the bankers and brokers is to keep out among the bulk of the people, acting as the distributors of these subsidiary coins, the largest possible volume of them.

Now, this bill, instead of being one for the relief of the poor people of the United States, ought properly to have its title amended so as to make it read "A bill for the relief of the bankers and brokers of the United States, who fear that their vaults may be overloaded with subsidiary coins." It is in direct line with the action of the banks in New York last fall when they refused to receive silver coin across their counters, and I find every Representative who has within his district a large banking interest voting in support of this measure. It is what the bankers and brokers want.

When this bill passes they will have no further need of working off and keeping out among the people the supply of subsidiary coins that find their way to their counters. Pass this bill, and it is perfectly safe for them to keep the coins in any quantity and then to pay them into the Treasury of the United States and take greenbacks in exchange. The result will be that instead of having hundreds of distributing agents in the United States for the diffusion and circulation of coin, you facilitate the rapid aggregation and flow of them toward the bankers, brokers, and shopkeepers in the United States, who by this law are relieved from the care of a lot of cumbersome coin.

Now, I want to see the largest possible volume of these coins kept out among the people. I believe that it is a measure of relief and benefit to the poor people. It has been stated here that the poor people are being swindled in the issue of this money. Now, if you want to prevent them from being robbed, provide that they shall be legal tender in larger amounts. I will agree to that.

You cannot name a place anywhere in the United States where a grocery-man or a dealer in small wares charges the poor man, who has nothing but silver in his pocket, more than he charges the rich man.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLEY. I generally agree with the gentleman from Kansas, but in this instance I think he is wholly wrong.

My mail comes burdened each day with appeals to me to relieve the working classes and the small traders of my city from a tax amounting annually, as some of the best business men in the city, whose letters I now hold in my hand, tell me, to hundreds of dollars—not for the benefit of the Government, but for the benefit of those whose trade is to buy and sell subsidiary silver coin and trade-dollars.

One highly respectable Quaker firm in Pennsylvania made this sort of an appeal to me, after stating that the channels of retail trade were glutted with trade-dollars and fractional silver and describing how the small traders to whom they sold and who keep no bank accounts paid them in this inferior coin. They, on the other hand, who do business and keep bank accounts had consequently to carry this money to Third street and sell it, with the certainty that it would be sold again by the brokers at a profit and come back, and thus tax them and the small dealers who traded with them.

Another firm asked me if we could not so change the law as to enable them to deal honestly with the working people who were its customers. They said, as others have said, "These coins are bought by the large employers of labor from the brokers, and are paid out by them to workingmen who must take any form of money offered; because if they refuse there are other men as skilled as they waiting to step into their places. They bring the money they get to us, and if we do not wish to lose all our profits and ruin ourselves we must defraud them in one of three ways; we must either charge an extra price or defraud them in quality or quantity."

The plain story is this: the channels of circulation for retail trade in the city are gorged with dollars, issued by the Government, cast probably from the same crucible with standard dollars, which contain 7½ grains more than the standard dollars, and which, not being legal tender, are meat on which the silver brokers feed, or rather they take the place, as it were, of the blood of the laboring classes in order to fatten the dealers in these base coins.

Now, this is a proposition to relieve these channels of trade by requiring the Government, if it has issued an excess of fractional currency containing, not as the trade-dollar does, 420 grains, but containing 385 grains only to the dollar; if it has in its greed to make good Treasury reports issued a surplus of these low-priced fractional coins on the issue of which it is making from 25 to 33 per cent., it shall redeem them in lawful money, so that the laborer and the man who keeps no bank account shall not be defrauded, and those who deal with these classes shall not be compelled either to defraud them or to forego their profits.

Here are letters from firms whose names are known wherever they are known, as among the leading business men of Philadelphia and New York. A leading house of grain dealers says to me: "Our commission is 2½ per cent.; many of those who purchase from us keep no bank account; we have to take what they receive, as they retail what they purchase from us, and we often have to pay 2 per cent. discount to the brokers in Third street out of our 2½ per cent. commission." I say it is against the dignity and the honor of the nation to maintain such a coinage, and I hope this bill will pass.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEAVER. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

Mr. WEAVER. I desire to move an amendment to the third section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had better retain his amendment until the third section is reached. The House is now considering the first section of the bill.

Mr. WEAVER. I beg pardon; I thought this bill was open to amendment in any part.

Mr. FORT. This bill has not yet been printed, and it is almost impossible to understand fully its full scope. When the proper time comes I desire to move to strike out the entire third section of the bill. There may be no very great objection to the first section nor to the second section of the bill. The first section provides that any person having $10 of small silver coins may exchange them at the Treasury for the legal-tender money of the United States. It may be that there are no objections to that. The second section provides that the Treasurer of the United States shall exchange these same small coins for the legal-tender notes of the United States when anybody desires to have it done. And there may be nothing wrong in that. This seems to be the entire scope of the first and second sections of the bill. They simply authorize the holder of small coins to receive Treasury notes or other legal-tender money for them; and also authorize any person holding Treasury notes or other legal-tender money to receive small coins in exchange. They simply make small silver coins interchangeable for the larger legal-tender money of the United States.

While I am upon the floor, if permitted to do so, I will say that the third section of the bill is wrong, in my judgment. There is no great necessity for making these small coins legal tender for $10 instead of $5 as is now the law. Under this third section of the bill five-cent pieces would be a legal tender for $10. I can see no great necessity for this. They are now legal tender for $5, and when a tender of $10 is desired then legal tender silver dollars or Treasury notes can be used. But the more serious objection to this third section is that it provides that these small silver coins shall be taken up. Just what this means I may not know, but I presume it means that they shall be put out of circulation. At least the bill provides for taking them up, but makes no mention of putting them out again.

Mr. KELLEY. I think the bill merely makes them interchangeable; that if parties give them, they can get them again.

Mr. FORT. I will say to the gentleman that the bill does not so provide. The first and second sections do make them interchangeable unquestionably; the third section provides for raising the legal-tender quality from $5 to $10, and also provides that the small coins shall be taken up, and there leaves them. They will then be in the Treasury, and will likely remain or be hoarded. At least, we are not informed what is to be done with them. The bill seems to be wanting, at least in this respect.

Mr. WEAVER. The chairman of the committee [Mr. STEPHENS] agrees that that shall be stricken out, and such is the purport of the amendment I wish to offer.

Mr. FORT. That is a question for the House to settle. The gentleman from Georgia has nothing more to do with it than the gentleman from Iowa. In my judgment, we had better strike out the entire third section. I can certainly see no reason why it should not be done. If the bill embraced only the first two sections with the fourth section, which is merely a repealing provision, I do not know what objection there could be to it. It is, however, doubtful whether we ought to be tinkering with the currency quality of these coins. The hard-money man and the soft-money man could equally support it or oppose it; for it is not in the interest of one particular view more than another. I only hope we may be careful not to drive any good money out of circulation.

These small silver coins are very good, and it may be that they ought to be redeemable in larger legal money, but we ought not to suppress them. I am not certain but for the convenience of the people we ought to have retained in use the half dollar and quarter dollar of fractional currency. It was very convenient and good.

Mr. STEPHENS. As this bill will not go through to-day, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed, so as to be laid on the desks of members to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to that order, and it will be made.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is it in order now to submit amendments, that they may be printed with the bill?

The SPEAKER. Amendments may be indicated for that purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to strike out in the third section the word "ten" and insert "twenty;" so as to make silver a legal tender in sums of $20.

Mr. WEAVER. I would like to have my amendment considered as pending, to be voted on hereafter.

Mr. WARNER obtained the floor.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] as entitled to the floor in the next morning hour.

PRINTING SPEECHES ON LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask unanimous consent that every member may be allowed to print in the RECORD any remarks he may wish to submit upon the legislative appropriation bill now pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee, that any member who may desire to print in the RECORD remarks upon the legislative appropriation bill, now under consideration in Committee of the Whole, may have permission to do so.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not object to this request; but I want to suggest that whenever general permission is given to print remarks it ought to be understood that this does not include permission to make personal criticisms on other members. I recollect at the last session, when a general permission of this kind was given, a man who is not now a member printed a most severe and I think wickedly unjust criticism on a gentleman who was dead. Without supposing that anybody who is now here would violate this rule, it ought to be understood that a permission of this sort does not carry with it the right to indulge in what may be called personal discussion.

Mr. ATKINS. A just public sentiment will hold any gentleman responsible for such improprieties.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that this matter is left to the honor of members. Of course no member should undertake to publish personalities in which he would not be permitted to indulge upon the floor.

Mr. ATKINS. No brave or honorable man would do it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I only make the suggestion in order that there may be no misunderstanding.

The SPEAKER. It is always understood—and the Chair may as well announce the fact—that where a gentleman is permitted to print remarks which he has not the opportunity to deliver on the floor he does so under an obligation resting upon him in honor not to print anything of a personal character.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated last evening that he would at the close of the morning hour to-day ask to have referred executive communications now on the Speaker's table. This is a time when a motion to go to the Speaker's table would be in order. The Chair therefore asks consent to present these executive communications. [A pause.] He hears no objection.

Wheeler, Corps of Engineers; 3,000 copies for the House of Representatives, 1,000 copies for the Senate, and 1,000 copies for the use of the War Department, the printing from the stereotype plates and binding to be done by the Government Printer, and the style of the text, together with the accompanying plates, maps, and atlas-sheets, to correspond with those now printed, the latter from proofs corrected and approved at the office of the United States Topographical Surveys.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the subject of the distribution of public documents not yet distributed be referred to the Committee on Rules, with a request to report at an early day.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire, as a privileged question, to call up the resolution introduced by me on this subject a few mornings ago, and now on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is now in the morning hour.

Mr. ATKINS. I suggest that the gentleman occupy the morning hour with his resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well.

Mr. DUNNELL. I introduced a resolution yesterday on this subject which I believe will be acceptable to the House, and I ask unanimous consent that it be again presented to the House.

Mr. THOMPSON. I object. [Laughter.]

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill. And pending that motion, I move that all general debate on the bill be closed on Saturday at five o'clock.

Mr. KELLEY. This does not affect me personally, as I am at this time entitled to the floor. But let me say that I can see no advantage likely to result from limiting the debate until we know something of how long the senatorial discussion upon the Army bill is to be continued.

Mr. CARLISLE. I suppose it is not improper for me to state that I have been informed by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, who has charge of the Army bill in that body, that the debate upon it will not be concluded before next Wednesday or Thursday.

Mr. ATKINS. Well, let us fix the time for closing debate upon this bill for Tuesday at two o'clock.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman that he wait till he sees what progress is made in the Senate with the Army bill.

Mr. ATKINS. As long as one body waits for the other there will be no progress made. Let us pass this bill if we want an early adjournment. I will modify my motion so that all general debate shall close at two o'clock on Tuesday.

Mr. CONGER. I regret that the gentleman from Tennessee, having occupied the first and only hour that has been given to general debate on this bill——

Mr. ATKINS. It is true I had the first hour, but I yielded it all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is on the floor.

Mr. CONGER. The very moment he has occupied that hour which he has under the rules, and which he filled so much to the satisfaction of all the members present, should now attempt to limit the debate and cut off others from the same privilege which he has enjoyed.

Mr. ATKINS. That is of a piece with the characteristic insincerity and unfairness of the gentleman from Michigan. There is just as much truth in that as in a great many other things which he says.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the gentleman had his hour yesterday. Am I mistaken in that?

Mr. ATKINS. I yielded that hour to two gentlemen from Alabama, and if the gentleman from Michigan was not in his seat then it was not my fault.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman used his hour as he chose, as every other member will use his hour. I have no reason to suppose it was used in a way unsatisfactory to the House.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well, it is very uninteresting to the House for gentlemen to bandy words. I decline to do so with the gentleman.

Mr. CONGER. I have nothing to do with the bandying of words. I was speaking to the House and the gentleman bandied. I am glad he apologizes for it.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not apologize to the gentleman. I am incapable of apologizing to that gentleman—that man.

Mr. CONGER. I am equally glad that the gentleman withdraws his apology.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not withdraw it. I made none.

Mr. CONGER. And I am equally pleased that the gentleman shows some little feeling.

Mr. ATKINS. It is a pity the gentleman from Michigan could not show some, but he has none.

Mr. CONGER. I am pleased with the exhibition of sensibility and feeling wherever it comes from.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to the question. In my opinion an attempt to gag this House in the discussion of these political propositions is an unfair one. I do not say it is intended so. But I think the effect of it would be to prolong debate and occupy the time in discussions about the limitation of debate. If the bill is left open for debate, so that every gentleman on that side and on this side shall have a reasonable opportunity to say what he desires, I think we shall reach the conclusion of the debate sooner and more satisfactorily than if we attempt to restrict it now at the very commencement of it. I hope, therefore, the resolution fixing the time for closing debate will not be adopted now. As we progress with the debate, if it becomes necessary to shorten it, if more time is likely to be occupied than the interest of the country or the wishes of the members require, we can at any time shorten the debate. The gentleman from Tennessee has the floor for that purpose at any moment.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I have made the motion in deference to the request of a great many gentlemen on both sides of this House, and I have nothing to add in behalf of it. Every member knows his own mind upon the subject without any suggestion from me. I submit the motion, and I trust the House will take a vote upon it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend by striking out Tuesday and inserting Friday week; that is one week from to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and pending that motion he moves that all general debate on the bill in Committee of the Whole shall be closed on Tuesday next at two o'clock. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] moves to amend that motion by striking out Tuesday and inserting Friday week at the same hour, and the question is first on the amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. GARFIELD's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 103, noes 58.

Mr. WRIGHT and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, forty-five members voting therefor.

Mr. GARFIELD. At the suggestion of several gentlemen I will modify my amendment so as to make it Thursday week instead of Friday.

Mr. SPARKS. If the gentleman will make it "Wednesday" we will agree to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I prefer to change it to "Thursday," as has been suggested to me by many gentlemen.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I object to the change.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered was reconsidered.

The question recurred upon ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. ATKINS. Before that motion is put I desire to ask a question. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] what day he suggested?

Mr. GARFIELD. Thursday week.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain discussion upon that point. The Chair is bound, the affirmative having prevailed upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered, to put the question again upon ordering the yeas and nays, and if one-fifth of the members present vote to have the yeas and nays, then it is their constitutional right to have them. Objection being made to the change of day, the motion is for debate to close at two o'clock on Friday, to-morrow one week.

The question was again put upon ordering the yeas and nays; and, forty-nine members voting therefor, the yeas and nays were ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution to print 250 additional copies of the observations on the transit of Venus for the use of the Naval Observatory, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question was taken upon Mr. GARFIELD's amendment to the motion to close debate; and there were—yeas 132, nays 91, not voting 63; as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. GARFIELD was agreed to.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. STEELE. I am paired with Mr. NORCROSS, of Massachusetts. I do not know how he would vote if here.

Mr. KENNA. My colleague, Mr. WILSON, is absent on account of serious illness in his family, and is paired on all questions.

Mr. COVERT. My colleague, Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, is confined to his house by illness. My colleagues, Mr. MULLER and Mr. CAMP, are paired.

Mr. RICHMOND. My colleague, Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, is paired with Mr. WAIT, of Connecticut.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. MORSE. I also desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. CRAPO, is paired with Mr. ROSS, of New Jersey.

Mr. BAILEY. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. LOUNSBERY. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. FARR. I desire to announce that Mr. MASON, of New York, is paired with Mr. BACHMAN, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HARMER. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. KLOTZ. If he were present, I should vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The motion of Mr. ATKINS, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. CLYMER. I hope the gentleman will not make that motion.

Mr. PRICE. I think we had better end this matter right here.

Mr. CLYMER. We may get through sooner than that.

Mr. PRICE. Well, I withdraw the motion.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. ATKINS, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask unanimous consent that from this time until the time fixed by the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] for closing the debate the entire sessions of the House may be devoted to debate.

The SPEAKER. That would cut off the morning hour.

Mr. STEPHENS. I object.

The question was taken on Mr. ATKINS's motion; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, in disregard of the rules of rhetoric and in view of the uncertainties of congressional debate, I propose to begin my remarks with a statement of my conclusions.

I will vote for the repeal of the test oath for jurors, should that proposition come before the House as a separate measure. During the last Congress I advocated the repeal of the provisions requiring that oath, and I say now, as I said then, that they are exasperating incongruities in our law and should therefore be repealed.

I will vote for the repeal of the section under which soldiers are sent to the polls, as proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] To vote for the provision as it stands in the bill before the House, which is as a novel provision in restraint of the use of the Army, would be an injustice to the republicans who passed it when war was flagrant and they had two-thirds in each House, and to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, the illustrious man who gave it his presidential sanction.

And I will vote as a separate proposition for the repeal of the provisions of law under which deputy marshals are sent to the polling places of the country. I believe that those provisions of law have been abused; I think I have seen them abused. The sections referred to were enacted when we were in war or during the process of reconstruction and when a majority of the former voters of some of the border States, at least of one of them, Missouri, were disfranchised by the constitution of the State. We are now at peace, the work of reconstruction has been completed, and they should in my judgment be repealed.

But, sir, I will not vote for the repeal or essential modification of the law authorizing the appointment and fixing the duties and powers of supervisors of elections. As I understand the original Constitution it vested the ultimate control of all elections relating to national offices in Congress, and I believe that a body which may control should supervise. The application of this law is not sectional, and is more needed in the great cities of the North where repeaters and personators can practice frauds with greater facility than elsewhere. It has so far as my observation has extended been fairly administered, and has in Philadelphia promoted purity of elections. It should remain upon the statute-book.

I listened yesterday with interest to the gentlemen from Alabama, Messrs. LEWIS and SAMFORD, and was reminded by their suggestions that on the 27th of February, 1866, I had made an elaborate argument in favor of the position I have just announced, in which I considered every phrase uttered in the convention for framing the Constitution of the United States, or in any of the State conventions for considering it, which were brought to the notice of the House by those gentlemen.

I will not detain the committee by reciting the mass of authorities I then adduced; but will say to gentlemen that if they feel disposed to examine it they will find it in volume 57 of the Congressional Globe, beginning with page 1057. I will, however, bring to the attention of the committee the reply of Mr. Madison in the convention of Virginia to the question propounded by Mr. Monroe, and the fiery declamation of Patrick Henry against the authority the Constitution, if adopted, would give Congress over elections. The calm, evidently well-considered, and deliberate statement of Mr. Madison in defense of the power, and the eloquent, though some may think it demagogical, denunciation of it by Patrick Henry, are alike arguments in support of my proposition. The following colloquy is found in the proceedings of the Virginia convention of the 13th of June, 1788:

Mr. Monroe wished that the honorable gentlemen who had been in the Federal convention would give information respecting the clause concerning elections. He wished to know why Congress had an ultimate control over the time, place, and manner of elections of Representatives, and the time and manner of that of Senators; and also why there was an exception as to the place of electing Senator.

In reply Mr. Madison said:

Mr. Chairman, the reason of the exception was, that if Congress should fix the place of choosing the Senators, it might compel the State Legislature to elect them in a different place from that of their usual sessions, which would produce some inconvenience and was not necessary for the object of regulating the elections. But it was necessary to give the General Government a control over the time and manner of choosing the Senators to prevent its own dissolution.

With respect to the other point, it was thought that the regulation of the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives should be uniform throughout the continent. Some States might regulate the elections on the principles of equality and others might regulate them otherwise. This diversity would be obviously unjust. Elections are regulated now unequally in some States, particularly South Carolina, with respect to Charleston, which has a representation of thirty members. Should the people of any State by any means be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government. It was found impossible to fix the time, place, and manner of the election of Representatives in the Constitution. It was found necessary to leave the regulation of this, in the first place, to the State governments, as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government, in order to enable it to produce uniformity and prevent its own dissolution. And considering the State government and General Government as distinct bodies, acting in different and independent capacities for the people, it was thought the particular regulations should be submitted to the former and the general regulations to the latter. Were they exclusively under the control of the State governments the General Government might easily be dissolved. But if they be regulated properly by the State Legislatures, the congressional control will very probably never be exercised. The power appears to me satisfactory and as unlikely to be abused as any part of the Constitution.

And the proceedings for the 17th of the same month present this passage from Patrick Henry's speech:

Congress is to have a discretionary control over the time, place, and manner of elections. The Representatives are to be elected, consequently, when and where they please. As to the time and place, gentlemen have attempted to obviate the objection by saying that the time is to happen once in two years, and that the place is to be within a particular district or in the respective counties. But how will they obviate the danger of referring the manner of election to Congress? Those illumined genii may see that this may not endanger the rights of the people; but in my unenlightened understanding it appears plain and clear that it will impair the popular weight in the Government. Look at the Roman history. They had two ways of voting—the one by tribes and the other by centuries. By the former, numbers prevailed; in the latter, riches preponderated. According to the mode prescribed, Congress may tell you that they have a right to make the vote of one gentleman go as far as the votes of one hundred poor men. The power over the manner admits of the most dangerous latitude. They may modify it as they please. They may regulate the number of votes by the quantity of property without involving any repugnancy to the Constitution.

Fiery as was this declamation, it did not prevent the convention from ratifying the Constitution and vesting in Congress the power which Mr. Henry thought so dangerous.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will not vote for any of these provisions as riders on an appropriation bill; and, disclaiming all knowledge as to the purpose of the President, I say here and now that if the Army appropriation bill and the bill now before the House shall be sent to him in their present form and he, believing it to be his duty, shall veto them, I will sustain the veto.

If the President shall conscientiously disapprove of either of these bills it will be his duty to veto it. Turning to the Constitution of the United States I find the provision that where a bill having passed both Houses shall "be presented to the President of the United States, if he approve he shall sign it; but if not he shall return it with his objection to that House in which it shall have originated."

One of the gentlemen from Alabama yesterday made a distinction between the words "may" and "shall." The supreme court of my State has decided that in cases like this "may" means "shall." But if there is any difference in the mind of any gentleman as to the degree of force attaching to these words, here is the command of the Constitution expressed with the stronger term to the President to veto a bill which his judgment cannot approve.

But the provision of the Constitution touching the veto power does not stop here. It limits that power and shows when and how the Legislature may override the veto. Thus, after directing how a vetoed bill shall be reconsidered, it says:

If after such reconsideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law.

In view of these provisions of the Constitution I warn gentlemen that the party which attempts to override a veto by any other means than those thus provided will be trampled out of existence. The American people love the Constitution, and neither in the South nor in the North will they sustain action outside of the Constitution for subverting the powers of any of the departments of the Government. Ours is a government of constitutional checks and balances. Its framers wisely provided against rash, hasty, inconsiderate, or improvident legislation, and they made the veto subject to reversal by a vote of two-thirds of both Houses, one of the most important checks, and also made it the sworn duty of the President to exercise the power.

The action of Congress and the Executive under that Constitution can speedily, in the life of a nation at least speedily, be reviewed. Always within two years the people can review the action of Congress, and in less than that period from this date the executive department of the Government and Congress will both be in the hands of the people, who will, if a conflict of opinion between the two branches be disclosed, determine whether the veto was right or wrong. If right, they will give it the sanction of the sovereignty of the nation, and if wrong will send a Congress here who in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution will reverse the executive action.

On this question of riders on appropriation bills I wish to be explicit. I do not charge that putting extraneous and irrelevant provisions on appropriation bills is revolutionary. It is not; and such an assertion is preposterous. It is not unconstitutional, nor does it contravene any rule of either House of Congress. And if that which is vicious can be justified by precedent, this practice has been abundantly justified by the action of all parties from soon after the foundation of the Government. Especially have all parties found it convenient to resort to it when partisan leaders believed, as the leaders of both parties now seem to believe, that it was necessary to inflame the popular passions, and whenever private greed has demanded the enactment into law of provisions which could not be advocated upon their own merits as separate acts or provisions of law.

I have applauded the resort to this method of inflaming the passions of my countrymen, and I have had the advantage of the practice when it was resorted to for possibly baser purposes. I remember well when in 1847 that gallant young democrat from Northern Pennsylvania sought to stay the spread of slavery into the free Territories by appending to an appropriation bill the proviso which has made the name of David Wilmot immortal. The hot blood of young and vigorous manhood then coursed my veins, and my enthusiasm was aroused to the utmost degree. I had then had no legislative experience. I abhorred slavery. I worshiped freedom. While yet a youth I had dreamed of better social conditions than existed, and had engaged in movements for the improvement of the laboring classes, and would have defended the freedom of the Territories and made them sacred to free labor at the cost of my life. The Wilmot proviso became my shibboleth. But now, when less than five rapidly flowing years lie between me and the allotted three score years and ten; when I have had eighteen years of legislative experience in this Hall, I see that it is never wise to appeal to the passions of a great, free, intelligent, and widespread people such as make up the constituency of this House. The story of our late terrible war is a protest against such appeals, of which it was the outcome.

Again I lauded the practice when, on the 18th of August, 1856, the republicans of this House, (for by that time the men who as free-soilers had sustained David Wilmot had organized the republican party,) by insisting upon a rider on the Army appropriation bill, compelled an adjournment without day. Congress was reconvened upon the call of the President, and met on the 21st. But the country rang, and the people were influenced by their passions more largely than by their reason. Again, sir, gentlemen will remember that it was upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, in 1872 I think, or thereabout, perhaps 1871.

Mr. CARLISLE. On the sundry civil bill.

Mr. KELLEY. No; I am going to speak of the other bill and what happened in 1871. Some unseen power in the Senate forced upon the bill I have named a provision which had been defeated over and over and over again in this House. It got upon the bill without anybody being responsible for it. It came back to us in the last hours of the session in the report of a conference committee, and all the gentlemen who were then members of the House know with what profound regret each one of us voted himself nearly $5,000, which previous law had not given us, and which with extreme reluctance we made it possible to take. But the report was from a conference committee, the session would soon close, and we adopted the report, salary-grab and all, rather than that the next $4 or $8 or $12 should not be paid the pensioners on regular quarter day.

The whole system of putting such riders on bills is, as I have said, vicious and ought to be abandoned. But it is not revolutionary. And the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] whose speech lies before me, under the title of "Revolution in Congress," has experienced a thorough revolution in opinion since the 8th of June, 1872, if he now believes the practice to be revolutionary.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him? I had supposed that there was nobody in this House who at this late day would say that I had ever asserted that it was revolutionary to put a rider on an appropriation bill. I never said so in my life. It is not in any printed, written, or spoken remarks that I ever made; and I suppose the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his mere iteration of such a charge, which is entirely foundationless, is obliged to take it up second-hand. I disclaimed absolutely such a view over and over again in the speech to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman had better take back the speech that he made on the Army bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I never said it in any speech.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not take up my statement at second-hand, and I repeat that if the gentleman does so believe he has reversed his opinion on the question. The gentleman shall speak for himself in language which he used in my time; there shall be no misapprehension between us on this point. I say that on the 8th of June, 1872, the gentleman asserted that for a minority in the House to resist such legislation by parliamentary tactics was to work congressional revolution; and I say further that he found so many of the members of his own party unite with the minority in the House that he learned that it was not solid republican doctrine, at that day, to call such legislative methods "revolutionary."

On page 4439 of volume 91 of the Globe will be found what the gentleman then said in time which I had yielded to him. Anticipating a portion of his recent speech, he said:

> Mr. Speaker, a question has therefore arisen in its importance far above any item in this bill, and even above the whole bill, and it is simply this: shall the majority of the members of this House have the right to consider and act upon a great appropriation bill in the mode provided in the rules? The moment a minority, however large, deny that proposition, that moment we are in the midst of a parliamentary revolution, and legislation of any sort is impossible forevermore until that position be utterly abandoned. In 1861 a large body of men in eleven States of this Union said that a majority of the American people might elect a President provided they did not elect Abraham Lincoln, but if a majority of the voters at the polls chose to elect Abraham Lincoln, then they, the minority, would break this Government in pieces, and Lincoln should never be President of this Republic. There was a revolution against the right of the majority to elect a President; four years of bloody war followed to vindicate the right of the majority to govern.

Again:

> But when the proposition is to proceed according to parliamentary law to consider and to debate, then when the minority undertakes to say that that thing shall not be done, it is simply an end of parliamentary government; it is a plain denial of the right to the majority of the American people to make laws, speaking through the majority of their Representatives.

I find the following brief colloquy on page 4422:

> Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from Ohio appealed to the House to sustain the bill in order to avert a parliamentary revolution. Why, sir, I have but stated the proximate reason for my action, but the underlying and supreme reason was the desire on my part to avert a parliamentary revolution.
> Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio. I did not say it was necessary to sustain this bill, but I said to act on this bill.

There was then no exception to the phrase "parliamentary revolution." We either had to act on the bill or there would be parliamentary revolution, although the minority could defeat, and were proceeding, when I interposed my peace proposition, to prevent action on the bill by methods within the rules of the House and which have frequently been resorted to by both parties. We did, however, on my motion act on the bill, and recommitted the report to the committee of conference that it might be brought more nearly into harmony with the general opinion of the House. And the session was, on my motion, prolonged from twelve to six o'clock, that that committee might have time to confer and report.

Responding to the remark from the gentleman that to prevent parliamentary revolution it was necessary to act on the bill, I proceeded to say:

> Very well, to act on the bill. I accept the gentleman's phraseology and thank him for the correction. Sir, parliamentary or other revolution is not likely to spring from imperfections in the rules of the House, nor am I of the belief that the rule of which he complains, that which secures the right of a numerous minority to defend its opinions, is an objectionable or dangerous one. During the eleven years I have had the honor of a seat in this House I have often felt that this reserved right of the minority was exercised in an improper manner; but I have always felt that, being here in a minority, I would also do what I have always honored the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bingham] who has just addressed the House for having done in the Thirty-fifth Congress. When, sir, it was attempted to control appropriations by refusing to put a proper restraining clause in an appropriation bill there was just such action by the republican minority, of which he was then an honored member. Whether it was right or not, for thirty-six hours the republican minority held the democratic majority in check and went to the country on the issue. That action did much to secure to the republican party the magnificent results of the following October and November elections. The country approved the action of the heroic republican filibusters who had held in check and defeated the powerful democratic majority.
> Sir, an inconsiderable minority have no power to control legislation. A vote of two-thirds will pass a bill on any Monday, or at any time within ten days of a final adjournment. Moreover, if the rule be an unwise one, it is within the control of the House, and we can alter it. The danger of parliamentary revolution comes not from this cause, but from quite another quarter, and that is from the absorption of all the powers of the Government by the Senate. That is the weak point in our Constitution and our Government, and never was it more glaringly demonstrated than during the present Congress. I pause not to allude to its ceaseless encroachments on the functions of the executive department of the Government, and will refer but briefly to facts within the knowledge of every member. The originating of revenue measures was confided to the House of Representatives by the Constitution; yet when we assembled here we were met by a revenue measure which had been prepared during the recess by a special committee of the Senate. It was soon sent to us for our acceptance. The House, which is charged with raising revenue and making appropriations for carrying on the Government, has always enjoyed the privilege of being the first to name the day for an adjournment. The Senate, however, long before our business was well shaped and before it was known what exigencies might arise, assumed the conceded functions of this House, and sent us a formal intimation as to the time at which it would, in its judgment, be convenient and agreeable for us to adjourn.
> And now, sir, when we come to act upon an important appropriation bill for the support of the Government, what do we find? The Senate meets us with the intimation that we may designate necessary appropriations, but we must yield our convictions on other points not germane to such a bill or they will prevent our bill from becoming a law. There is where the danger of revolution lies. And, sir, I may say that while my opposition to this measure is manifested as it is at this time by reason of my commitments of an honorable character to gentlemen on the other side, there is lying behind it the conviction that this method of passing any law, whatever the merits of the measure may be, is dangerous, and one for which the republican party ought not to make itself responsible. Therefore, I hope that this report will be recommitted; and on my motion to recommit I call the previous question.

Mr. Chairman, let me say again that such legislation is vicious and that the increasing frequency with which it has been resorted to during the last four years has deprived this House of all claim to the title of "a deliberative body." We may amuse ourselves with deliberating about a refrigerating ship or about the transit of Venus or the prevention of the spread of the cattle plague, but when it comes to passing great appropriation bills we must discuss their original provisions and proposed amendments thereto in five-minute debate, and ultimately in the last day or the last hours, or last minutes it may be, of a session we must pass them without knowing what is in them unless we have been able to do what no human being can do—note and remember all amendments made in either House and know them by the numbers given them in the conference report which we are then to hear for the first time.

I affirm, Mr. Chairman, without the fear of successful contradiction, that in the important legislation of the country the great body of the members of this House and the Senate do little else than register the decrees of four or six gentlemen, chosen in equal numbers from the two Houses, who constitute a committee of conference or a majority of such a committee; and no member leaves a session of the American Congress knowing, even in a general way, what he has voted for or against in the reports of the committees of conference to which all appropriations and many other important bills now go.

In view of these circumstances and of the recent absorption to itself under modified rules of all subjects of legislation by the Committee on Appropriations, let me ask what is the real condition of the country? Who makes its laws, and are they put on final passage after free and general discussion?

The House in Committee of the Whole is considering an appropriation bill under the five-minute rule and suddenly there is moved an amendment proposing to transfer the care of the Indians from the Interior to the War Department, or to provide for the reorganization of the Army, or to make any other fundamental change in the bureaus and departments of the Government. The amendment is not printed. The only chance for members to learn what it proposes is to listen while the Clerk reads and the five minutes allowed him who may get the floor for discussion are probably consumed in an effort to ascertain from its author an idea of what some clause or section means.

It is idle to criticise these unwholesome methods of legislating unless a remedy be proposed, and in this connection I promise that at the opening of what should have been the first session of this Congress, to suggest remedies for some of these evils by submitting two propositions for consideration as amendments to the Constitution. One will provide that laws on no two subjects shall be embraced in the same act. The other will propose to give the Executive the right to veto particular provisions in an appropriation bill, and yet to approve the other provisions of the bill and let so much of it become a law. With these two provisions in the Constitution I believe Congress would become a deliberative body, whose members would be, as they now are not, each in his degree responsible for the action of the House. And I further believe that the people would then come to understand what their representatives were doing and would be allowed to pursue the ordinary avocations of life without such appeals to their fears and passions as are now being made by partisan leaders here and elsewhere.

I have no fear of another attempt at revolution or of a failure of our institutions. I am by nature an optimist. My faith in the capacity for self-government of a people as enlightened and energetic as are the American people is absolute, and I believe such agitations as that now being attempted will awaken them to the importance of such constitutional remedies as I have suggested. This done, their early adoption would be assured.

We are improving our institutions. They are not perfect, but they are better than they were eighteen years ago. No slave can now breathe our air. And, sir, permit me to remark, and I use the language of the day, meaning no offense to any gentleman to whom the term applies, that there is not a "confederate brigadier" on this floor who does not firmly believe that slavery was a curse equally to master and to man and that the South is well rid of it even at the terrible cost at which its riddance was accomplished. It has, however, left rankling memories behind it on both sides of the old dividing line that are food for the agitator. Constitutional amendments nor statutory provisions can remove them. It is not wonderful that he who was a petty baron upon his plantation, owning his retainers, should be unwilling to recognize them at once as social or political equals, and I need but recall my own struggles and those of my colaborers in the free-soil and republican parties to learn that with them and me there are surviving prejudices and passions which often control us unconsciously to ourselves.

As I have said, sir, legislation or constitutional provisions cannot eradicate these memories, prejudices, and passions. But, in the name of society we may devoutly thank God that there are agents that will efface them. Time ripens generations, and death gathers them into his silent fold, and in a little while there will be gentlemen on this floor who will have known neither the social influence of slavery nor the passions engendered by the struggle for its overthrow. Then the country may hope for wiser and more temperate counsels; but until then we must expect to encounter distrust and suspicion, and to be involved at times in impassioned controversy. Meanwhile such amendments as I have suggested will conserve the peace of the country; and, more than that, they will purify this Capitol of the swarms of tempters of both sexes that throng the corridors when appropriation bills upon which jobs are proposed to be put are under consideration.

Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the brilliant oratorical display elicited by the Army bill, I could not join in the applause so boisterously bestowed on either side. I did not laugh as so many others did, because I could not. It was the most impassioned and brilliant display of the kind I had ever witnessed, and yet as I recall it now there comes to my mind but one gentleman on each side of the House, Mr. ROBESON, of New Jersey, and Mr. CARLISLE, of Kentucky, who seemed to desire to discuss only the legal aspects of the case and to rest his reputation on such discussion. As I heard the inflammatory appeals of gentlemen, and the responses they elicited from the floor and galleries, I felicitated myself that I was not responsible for this extra session, nor by word or act had promoted the intemperate tone in which response had been made to those who had precipitated the session upon the country.

So far as I might, from my party position, argue with and persuade gentlemen in the majority during the last Congress, I put forth my best efforts to avert this session. And my plan of meeting the announcement that the majority had burned their bridges, and the utterance of other martial phrases, indicating that a declaration of war was to be made, would have been to quietly present the legal and constitutional propositions involved as coldly as they could be stated. No other response would considerate patriotism have offered to these inflammatory declarations. Had this course been pursued, it would have checked rather than inflamed the passions on the other side. To have quietly said through our leader, "There is the law and there the constitutional provisions applicable to the case, gentlemen, and we have no wordy war to make. You can pass the bill, and the President may approve it. For that we will not be responsible. But he may veto it. And if then, upon a reconsideration of the bill, you go beyond the limits prescribed by the Constitution, the consequences, North and South, will be upon you and your party."

But the debate has taken its course, and I say to gentlemen on the other side of the House that they have but to adjourn upon a veto, leaving the light-houses on our coasts, and the courts, and all the machinery of the Government dependent upon these bills unused, and incapable of use, to make the North as solid as it was from 1861 to 1865. It will, irrespective of party, stand by the Constitution as it stood by it when it was being administered for the preservation and maintenance of the life of the nation and the unity of the country.

Nor are you, permit me to remind you, sure of a solid South in support of an unconstitutional measure. Your South is not solid to-day. There are three southern republicans here. Of what you deride as the center, one comes from Texas, one from Missouri, and one from Alabama, representing democratic districts. You have three independent democrats who beat the regular nominees of your party, and there are among you more than a score of gentlemen who, though enjoying the right to go into the democratic caucus, know that had they not successfully courted the greenback vote of their districts other men would have occupied the seats they now fill. No, sir, the South is not solid, and you have but to threaten to invoke war by invading the Constitution to find your party crumbling in the South as it would do in every Northern State of the Union.

I have no fear of war or threat of war. Behind us all lie the people, the depositary of all power, and they will see to it that if they have mistaken their man for this Congress they have mistaken him for the last time. Nay, they will see to it that their voice in this Hall shall be uttered in favor of reilluming the lights along the coast, of setting the courts and mints in motion, of opening the national Library, and setting the Government in all its branches in vital motion again.

Sir, our country is filled with discontent and murmuring. Capital finds no profit and seeks shelter in the vaults of the Treasury at 4 per cent. per annum; while labor, ill-requited when employed, wanders over the country seeking work at any wages. The country needs repose. Nothing could be more baneful to it at this time than agitation. Yet such has been the course of debate in this session that wounds that had cicatrized are bleeding afresh, and passions that slumbered and seemed to have died are blazing with the brilliancy of mid war. It is not a healthful condition for Congress to have brought a suffering people to, and gentlemen, come from what section they may, who fan these flames may find an indignant constituency ready to call them to account and denounce them as unfaithful servants.

In a recent article on Canadian affairs Goldwin Smith said, "Party without great questions is faction, and faction if it is not checked will before long bring calamity upon the country." What are the questions which this Congress proposes to propound as the issue for the presidential contest which it proposes to precipitate upon the people a whole year before the usual time? I mean no disrespect to gentlemen upon either side when I tell them that a nation cannot grow and fatten on hate. A nation cannot prosper in the midst of impassioned agitation. Nor in a great country like this can you prevent party degenerating into faction when you propose to entertain the people for two years on the bootless question as to which is the blacker, the democratic pot or the republican kettle. No, the minds of the people will not be interested in such questions. They believe that the eyes of party leaders should not be in the back of the head. Hope points them to the future. They are feeling the pressure of unusual want. They are asking for relief. In the presence of abundant harvests they find themselves passing year by year, month by month, day by day, from comfort and decent homes to want and vagrancy; and you can feed them into contentment on no such breathings of the east wind as have been indulged in these Halls during this session. The period is one full of instruction and one which will mark an epoch in the history of mankind.

Not alone do our people suffer. No, sir; the suffering is world-wide and under diverse conditions, which if properly studied would be marvelously instructive to legislators. Look at the condition of our country, of Germany, and of England, and contrast it with that of France and Italy. Free trade, gold-using England, the workshop of the world, the mistress of the sea, the nation whose ships do the general carrying trade of the world, and by the folly of many nations also enter into their local coastwise trade as there are gentlemen who would have them do in our country—where is she in the race for future supremacy?

Ernst Seyd, the ablest statistician in that country, tells us that from the demonetization of silver by Germany she has lost one thousand millions of dollars of her accumulated capital in three years, and is losing in a larger ratio this year than ever before. Her factories and mines are closed. Such is her immense wealth that her land is in parks and game preserves for the sport of the aristocracy and the gentry. She looks to us and other nations for most of her food.

Turn from her to Germany. In 1872 she seized the most valuable provinces of France and assessed upon her a war fine and costs that the world believed would bankrupt France. Yet where is she? Why, she adopted the British fetish and fell down and worshiped it; she banished her silver money and established a gold coinage; she opened her ports to free trade, and her condition is now, if possible, worse than that of England.

What are the causes of these conditions? But look at France, though she was stripped of her most valuable provinces and doomed to pay the fine and war charges to which I have alluded, she is proceeding to build up and cement a republic; is keeping her people employed and has engaged in the largest extension of public improvements she has ever undertaken at one time, and is, in her exceptionally prosperous condition, an example to the world.

Go from France to Italy, a nation that does not talk of gold money; that is struggling to substitute for a depreciated paper currency silver coin. How do you find her? England's commerce is prostrated, the commerce of Germany is prostrated, our own vessels are carrying cargoes but one way when they cross the Atlantic. Yet we find the foreign trade of Italy growing more rapidly than that of any other nation in the world.

Here are grand and instructive examples lying before us. Here are questions for the discussion of which the people hunger, and yet by the resort to parliamentary movements the leaders of both parties refuse to discuss these questions or to permit others to discuss them. These leaders have engaged in what the French call the "conspiracy of silence," and hope to suppress the aspirations of the people by refusing to notice them.

Gentlemen, that cannot be done. Ours is an earnest people. The "center" of this body, as you sneeringly call it, consisting of fifteen members, may be all wrong in every proposition they entertain, why not then let them state those propositions and show the people how foolish they are? Why not in the field of open and fair debate demonstrate the ignorance, the folly of those who say that industrial relief can be given by wiser and more conservative financial measures? No, gentlemen, the question as to the vessel of which party has been the blacker in the past will not satisfy the American people now and in the immediate future.

The eloquent gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] who now occupies the chair, and who always speaks with emphasis, said in the course of his speech:

> We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-book, which, like these, were born of the passions incident to civil strife, and looked alone to the abridgment of the liberties of the citizen.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in a speech he made preceding that of the gentleman from Kentucky, said:

> You turn down one leaf in 1861 and you propose to open a second chapter at the same place.

I couple these two sayings to mark their absurdity—if they mean anything or were intended to mean anything except plausible appeals to popular passion.

Suppose that all the laws passed by Congress during the last eighteen years except those to provide specially for the maintenance in the simplest manner of the Government, the collection of the revenue and the maintenance of the national credit, were stricken from the statute-books; how far back would that act turn the hands on the dial of time? Suppose the work accomplished, will it restore the past? Will it become dangerous, as it was in 1856, for me to make a republican speech in the old fourth congressional district which I have so long represented? Will the people in one section of that district, in their mad devotion to slavery in the South, stone me and my auditors as they then did? Will fires be kindled under the platform from which I would speak and drugs be thrown upon them which in burning emitted odors of such deadly pungency as to cause the meeting to disperse as a whirlwind would dispel a floating line of smoke? Will they welcome me with eggs again in the ward in which my home stands? No! No! Nor would the repeal deprive the colored citizens of Pennsylvania, as did the democratic party in 1838, of their right of suffrage enjoyed from the foundation of the Government till then, or exclude them from the means of public personal transportation. Do you believe it would restore the past in the South and require each fleeing negro to get a pass before he leaves the plantation, and make it a penalty for any conductor or other transporter of persons to give him passage upon the through lines of railroad North and South which are sustained by the fraternal and commercial intercourse that has grown up between the two sections since the war?

Gentlemen may not remember that when the confederacy was established it had not railroads that would connect its States with its capitol at Richmond, and that to supply the broken space of seventy miles from a point in North Carolina to Danville, Virginia, the confederate government had to tear up lateral roads to get the iron with which to make a continuous line. You now have such lines in the East and West, and the commerce of social intercourse and the commerce of trade traverse them and make them profitable to their owners.

No; strike out these statutes, and the gentleman from Kentucky need not hope nor the gentleman from Ohio fear that 1861 will return. God's providence moves not backward; this world moves onward; the spirit of man advances.

Though the republican party, legislating as it often did under the excitement of war and under the doctrine that the public welfare is the supreme law of the land, may have done unwise things, may have made great mistakes—it doubtless did. According to my judgment, as you will find it expressed in the Globe of the day, its work of reconstruction began a few years too soon; it was, as I judge from its results, not wisely done, as well as done prematurely—yet that party has made a record which will live in honor as long as man marks great eras in history.

"Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay," said a poet. Better for humanity twenty years such as the republican party has guided us through than even the best hundred years of European history. It has done more for the advancement of man; it has opened more acres to culture; it has opened more mines, more water-ways; it has obliterated more of prejudice; and while doing this and more in the same direction it has educated and trained the freed slave in schools and colleges and workshops till he walks a man in the presence of his offspring, and the rising generation springing from the loins of ex-slaves will in the long future know only the traditions and the impulses of American freemen.

If there are gentlemen on this floor on either side of the House looking to reactionary movements, and if they believe that such reaction as I have been alluding to can come, they had better abandon their faith. I have stood on the banks of the Mississippi and the Niagara; and as their great floods passed by have seen back eddies produced by the shape of the shores in which the water continues to flow back and back; but the great tide swept onward and carried commerce and man with it to the ocean and the lake.

So is it with the new-born political sentiments and intelligence of the day. The poor white and the freed black of the South, the people of the world have caught the impulse given by the results of the republican rule during and since our great war, and permanent reaction is impossible. Political motives will not control the people when personal necessities are pressing upon them. They feel the latter; the others are but things of luxury for seasons of repose. Sentimental politics are less potent than economic consideration with a free people.

If we will, instead of striving on both sides to promote political agitation, turn our thoughts to the condition of our country, study the great lessons that France, Italy, Germany, and England expose to our view, strive to reanimate the industries of the country, to enable capital invested in productive pursuits to earn more than 4 per cent.; if we will give labor to the people so that with their wages they may consume the products and pay the wages of each other, we may be able to reduce that debt the existence of which by offering better terms than private enterprise can earn is absorbing and locking in the vaults of the Treasury what should be the life-blood of trade and production. We can thus give content to the people and enable them to reduce that debt out of their surplus profits as rapidly as they were doing when Hugh McCulloch began the infernal work of retiring legal-tender money and driving the enterprise of the country to banks for accommodation at unholy rates of interest. To this end let us arrest political agitation.

[During the remarks of Mr. KELLEY the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARLISLE. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] be extended.

Mr. KELLEY. I think I am nearly through. I would be very grateful to the committee for a short extension of the time.

Mr. PRICE. How long a time does the gentleman desire? I know it is a thankless office for any gentleman to object to time being extended; but to-day we have had a fight for half an hour upon this floor as to when this debate shall close. There are fifty members upon this floor desiring to speak who have not yet said a word upon this bill, and who will be cut off from all opportunity to be heard at all events.

Mr. KELLEY. Very well, then; I will acquiesce in the gentleman's decision.

Mr. PRICE. We are presumed all to be upon an equality here. If five or ten minutes will be sufficient for the gentleman, I will not object.

Mr. KELLEY. I have said that I am nearly through. A man speaking from skeleton notes cannot speak to the minute.

Mr. SPEER. I hope the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] will withdraw his objection, as we are all anxious to hear the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] indicate what additional time shall be given?

Mr. CARLISLE. Any reasonable time.

The CHAIRMAN. If no limit is fixed, the extension will be for an hour.

Mr. CARLISLE. I will say fifteen minutes.

Mr. PRICE. Will ten minutes be sufficient? I mean no disrespect to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLEY. I know that.

Mr. TUCKER. Make it fifteen minutes.

Mr. PRICE. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the time of Mr. KELLEY was extended for fifteen minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. I thank the committee for their courtesy.

[The remarks were concluded as above.]

Mr. KELLEY. In deference to the gentleman from Iowa, I thus cut short my remarks.

Mr. PRICE. I do not think that remark is called for. I merely suggested what every gentleman on this floor knows to be the fact, that we are presumed to be equals on this floor, and if we interfere with the rights and privileges of any others we ought to have unanimous consent. It is very well known to this House that I am not a chronic objector—am very seldom on my feet here.

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Chairman, I shall discuss the questions now under consideration in the committee, so far as I shall discuss them at all, in no mere partisan spirit, and yet it may be necessary for me to state some facts and submit some conclusions not strictly of a non-partisan character.

The first question which presents itself relates to the form of the proposed legislation and the method by which it is sought to be accomplished. So much has already been said on this subject that I shall treat it very briefly. Whatever the gentleman from Pennsylvania who has just spoken [Mr. KELLEY] and others may think as to the propriety of incorporating substantive legislation into appropriation bills, no one of them can deny that it has been so frequently done during the last quarter of a century as to have become the rule rather than the exception. Twenty-four years ago this House incorporated into the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill—the most inappropriate place that could be imagined—a complete revision of all the tariff laws of this country, and sent it to the Senate. That provision was struck out in that body after a long debate, not because of the form in which it came, but because of objections to the substance of the legislation itself. And it is entirely safe to say that, at least since 1861, almost every general appropriation bill passed by Congress has contained provisions—and in many instances most important provisions—repealing old laws or enacting new ones; and this has been sanctioned by both political parties. Occasionally protests have been made, as they are made on this occasion; but in no instance, so far as I am aware, has such a protest been effectual.

During the long domination of the republican party in this House political legislation of the most important character was constantly enacted in these bills, and a part of the very laws which we now seek to repeal were passed in the sundry civil appropriation bill approved June 10, 1872. The very last legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill passed in Congress during the time it was under the control of that party contained a provision under which every gentleman from the State of Iowa to-day claims and holds his seat upon this floor. It is a very brief provision, and I will read it:

> That section 25 of the Revised Statutes, prescribing the time for holding elections for Representatives in Congress, is hereby modified so as not to apply to any State that has not yet changed its day of election and whose constitution must be amended in order to effect a change in the day of the election of State officers in said State.

And the very next section in the bill is one providing for the removal of suits from the State courts to United States courts in certain cases. But, Mr. Chairman, I need not stop to cite precedents or make an argument to show the existence of the right to resort to such methods of legislation. That the practice has been established, and that the right exists, is admitted by gentlemen on the other side; but they charge that it is revolutionary to exercise the right in this particular instance, because it is known or assumed that the proposed legislation does not meet the approval of the Executive. It seems to me that this places the gentlemen in a far worse position before this House and before the country than if they had taken the bold and manly ground that all the precedents established by themselves were wrong, and that the right to legislate in this form does not exist. To say that the practice has been established during a long series of years by both political parties, and that the right does in fact exist, but that it is revolutionary to exercise the right in any instance where it does not happen to meet the approval of the President, is to say that he is the master of the people's representatives, and that we ought to abandon an admitted practice and to surrender an acknowledged right at his dictation. It is admitted that it is neither unconstitutional nor revolutionary simply to repeal these laws; but it is charged that it is both unconstitutional and revolutionary to attempt to repeal them in a manner the Executive does not like. One gentleman, at least—the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE]—has been candid enough to declare on this floor, amid the applause of his political friends, that we shall not repeal these election laws until, in some manner, the present Executive has been removed from office. Here is the exact language of the gentleman, as reported in the official debates:

> You have not repealed the law affording protection to the voter at the polls yet. You have not repealed the election laws yet; and you will not repeal them until you have removed the present Executive from his chair. [Applause.]

Sir, this presents a square issue from which we, as the representatives of a majority of the people, cannot shrink without dishonoring ourselves and degrading our constituencies.

If there had previously been a doubt as to the propriety of the course we have adopted, that declaration and its indorsement by the party of the Executive on this floor, ought to have dissipated it. It has dissipated it; and I believe that to-day we stand as thoroughly united in our determination to assert the supremacy of the popular will, under the constitution, and to redress popular grievances by lawful means, as any body of men have ever stood since our race first began its struggle for free government and individual liberty. First we are told by one gentleman, standing high in the councils of his party, that we will not be permitted to repeal these objectionable laws in the form now proposed; and then another, with equal authority to speak, emphatically announces that we shall not repeal them at all in any form. Under such circumstances as these what difference does it make to us, or to the people whom we represent, whether the British House of Commons has attached legislation to supply bills during the last two centuries? We represent American citizens, not British subjects. We are dealing with an American President, not a British King. The Executive in this country has no prerogative in the monarchical sense of the term; he has only certain powers conferred upon him by a written constitution and by statute; but when he threatens to abuse those powers, if he should ever make such a threat, for the purpose of defeating legislation admitted to be deliberate, constitutional, and not impairing his rightful authority, all the means which the House of Commons in England was justifiable in using to prevent an abuse of the King's prerogative, we are equally justifiable in employing here.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that for nearly two hundred years the practice of "tacking" on supply bills, or accompanying such bills with petitions for the redress of grievances, has not been resorted to in England, but the House of Commons, to which alone that right belongs, has never by any act or declaration abandoned or surrendered it. And I beg to remind gentlemen of another historical fact, equally pertinent to this discussion, which is, that for nearly the same length of time the veto power has not been exercised in England. Since 1707, when the Queen vetoed the Scotch militia bill, no British sovereign has vetoed an act of the British Parliament. It is in fact the veto power that has died in that country. It could not live in the presence of that great principle of the British constitution which dissolves the ministry in every conflict between the Crown and the Commons. The executive power there is directed by a cabinet of ministers and not by the King, and in the whole world there is not to be found a body of men in authority more sensitive to the popular will than they are. In the face of a vote of want of confidence, or an adverse vote on an important government measure, they disappear as if they had been smitten by the arm of Omnipotence itself.

Any soveriegn who should now attempt to retain a ministry in opposition to the will of the Commons, or to persist in any important measure of government which did not meet their approval, would certainly imperil the peace of the kingdom, if he did not lose his crown. But my eloquent and learned friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] has so fully and clearly stated the character of the British government in this respect that nothing can be usefully added to what he has said.

We are told, however, that the grievance of which we complain is a law upon the statute-book; from which I suppose the inference is to be drawn that it is not a grievance for which the Executive is responsible, and therefore we have no right to make its redress a condition upon which we grant supplies of money to be expended by that department of the government. This statement omits the important and controlling fact, that the statute of which we complain is one which authorizes the Executive to send thousands of his subordinate officers to the polls to interfere with our elections as members of this House; and it is a just cause of complaint against him that he insists upon maintaining and exercising such a dangerous and unconstitutional power. The exclusive power to originate money bills—which include appropriation bills—belongs under the constitution to this body. This gives us the right, and makes it our duty, to determine when, under what circumstances, for what purposes, and to what amount we will propose the appropriation of the people's money. If we have not this right, if this is not our duty, if Congress is a mere machine to be set in motion by the hand of the Executive to grind out such appropriations as may be recommended, then we are clearly wrong in this controversy and the gentlemen on the other side are right. But if the constitution has conferred this power upon us, we are not wrong unless we abuse it, and for that we are responsible, not to the Executive, not to the minority here on this floor, but to the people who sent us here. Upon all questions of this character they are the exclusive and final judges. A great writer upon institutional law has said:

Whenever a question arises between the society at large and any magistrate vested with powers originally delegated by that society it must be decided by that society itself. There is not upon earth any other tribunal to resort to.

If unfortunately this proposed legislation shall fail by reason of an irreconcilable difference of opinion between the executive and legislative departments of the government, both must appeal to the original source of their power and abide the result. If it is revolutionary to join in this appeal rather than surrender our conscientious convictions upon a subject vitally affecting our own privileges and the liberties of our constituents, the country will rebuke us and we will be compelled to bow in submission to its judgment.

Now, sir, let us see whether these laws are of such a character as to justify us in taking the position we have in demanding their repeal. I will endeavor to show, Mr. Chairman, as briefly as the nature of the subject will permit, that they are so opposed to the spirit of our institutions, so repugnant to the constitution itself, and so oppressive upon the people that we are justifiable in declaring that we will not make this appropriation except upon the condition that they are removed from the statute-book.

It is my purpose to discuss to-day only that part of the pending bill which relates to the repeal of what are known as the election laws. As to those provisions of the existing law which exclude from the jury-boxes in the courts of the United States all those who are unable to take a certain test oath, they are so manifestly inconsistent with the English and American systems of jurisprudence and so fatal to the due administration of justice between man and man and between the government and its people, that I cannot persuade myself that any considerable number of gentlemen here or elsewhere will undertake to defend them. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] characterizes these provisions very mildly indeed when he says they constitute "an exasperating incongruity in our law."

As to those laws which relate to the elections, they are based upon the assumption that in the present condition of the country it is constitutional, wise, and necessary to clothe the Executive with authority to interfere with and control the election of members to this House, and I shall deal with them as laws enacted and maintained for that purpose.

This is no sectional question; and it ought not to be even a party question. It is a question of vital interest to every friend of constitutional liberty and to every lover of free parliamentary government throughout the whole country. It is a question which affects the people of the North more than the people of the South. According to the census of 1870 there were sixty-nine cities in the Union to which the most offensive and objectionable parts of these laws are applicable, fifty-five of them in the North and fourteen of them in the South. The fifty-five in the North contained a population of nearly five millions of souls, while the fourteen in the South contained only a little over one million and two hundred thousand. If we look at the expenditures we will find that more than five times as much money was disbursed in the years 1876 and 1878 to pay for the services of supervisors and special deputy marshals of elections in the Northern States as in the Southern States. The whole expenditure in 1876 was $275,296.60, of which the sum of $230,522 was paid for services in six Northern States, and only $44,774.60 for services in the South. In 1878 the whole sum expended was $202,291.09—so far as reported—and of this the sum of $177,652 was on account of services rendered by these officers at elections in the same six Northern States, and $24,639 in the whole South.

But, sir, I shall not go at length into that matter. I long to see the time come when the patriotism of our public men and the fraternal feelings of our people shall be broad enough to acknowledge but one boundary—the limits of this whole Union. [Applause.] If that time has not yet arrived, it is a consolation to me to know that I have never purposely said or done anything to postpone it.

Mr. Chairman, greater than all other questions affecting the constitution and organization of this House is the question whether this power of the Executive to interfere in the elections of its members shall be continued. If there be one principle in our federal system more valuable to the people than another it is that which was intended to secure the perfect independence of their representatives. This is the people's House; this is the only place in the councils of the Union where they speak and vote through representatives chosen directly by themselves. The right to choose their own representatives belongs, and ought to belong, to them exclusively. The power of the Executive, so far as it can legitimately affect the action of those representatives, must be exercised for the first time not only after the election but after the will of the people has been recorded here in the passage of bills. Under the constitution he may withhold his assent from our measures when they are sent to him in the regular way; but he cannot elect our members, or interfere with their elections, without a violation of every fundamental principle of free republican government and a subversion of our most cherished institutions.

He may not come into this hall and dictate the measures we shall pass or shall not pass; he may not, without the grossest indecency, even send his emissaries here to influence our deliberations either by threats of disapproval or by expressions of approbation; and yet it is contended that he ought to have the power to dictate our policy in advance by choosing the men who are to constitute our membership. Let the country understand distinctly what it is the gentlemen on the other side are contending for. They are not contending for free and fair elections; they are not contending for a pure ballot and a fair count, because these results can be better secured without executive interference than with it. They are contending for the power of the Executive to lay his hand upon the voter when he approaches the ballot-box to choose his representative, to bribe him with office, to intimidate him by threats of prosecution in distant and expensive tribunals, to seize the muniments of his title to suffrage, to arrest his person, and to confiscate his estate by the imposition of ruinous fines and forfeitures for technical offenses.

I am not one of those who would willingly obstruct the Executive in the exercise of any of his constitutional functions, or deprive him of any of his constitutional powers; but I am one of those who believe that every attempt to extend his authority beyond the limits prescribed in the constitution ought to be resisted by every lawful means at our command.

Sir, without these odious laws the influence of the executive department upon the politics of the country is almost irresistible. It commands the army and navy; it directs in a great measure the financial policy of the country; it disburses more than a hundred and fifty millions of dollars of the people's money every year in defraying the ordinary expenses of the government; it appoints all the judges of all the courts; it directs the execution of all the laws, and therefore controls all criminal and penal prosecutions; and it distributes among its adherents more than one hundred thousand offices and employments with emoluments amounting annually to many millions of dollars. These are vast powers; and when you add to them the authority given by these statutes to send thousands of subordinate executive officers to the polling places throughout the country, at every election for representatives, to judge of the qualifications of voters, to arrest them without warrant, and to deprive them of the right of suffrage for whatever the officer may choose to consider an offense, you have completed the full measure of executive power to control the organization and action of this House.

If any gentleman will reflect for a moment upon the peculiar and important functions performed by this body in the operations of the government, he cannot fail to realize the vast importance of preserving its perfect freedom and independence. Under the constitution we possess the sole power to originate bills to raise revenue by taxation upon the people, and to appropriate the public moneys. That money, when raised and appropriated, is to be disbursed by the executive department, which adds very largely to its power and influence over the people. Incidental to this, and necessarily involved in it, is the power of the House to determine whether there shall or shall not be an army and navy maintained at the public expense and commanded by the Executive. Under the constitution this House possesses the sole power to originate impeachments against the President himself and other officers of the United States; and in case of a failure to elect by the electoral colleges, this House, voting by States, has the sole power to choose the President. Here then are four great powers belonging exclusively to the House of Representatives, in the exercise of which the Executive may be directly affected either in his person or in his office.

If he can control the organization of this body by dictating the choice of its members generally, or by influencing the election of a sufficient number to hold the balance of power, he thereby controls its action on all these vital matters. He may determine, to a very large extent, the amount and form of taxation upon the people, and the amount and the objects for which appropriations shall be made; he may determine the size and organization of the army and navy, and the purposes for which they shall be used; he may prevent his own impeachment for the very corruptions which give him immunity, or secure the impeachment of a rival; and he may, in the contingency I have mentioned, provide for his own re-election to the executive office. It is not my purpose to elaborate these propositions. Their truth is too obvious to admit of argument, and the dangerous character of the power which the Executive would exercise in these instances is too apparent to require illustration. Do gentlemen on the other side seriously contemplate the permanent maintenance of a system of laws calculated to produce such results? Can it be possible that they place so low an estimate upon the intelligence of the people and so little reliance upon their virtue and love of liberty, as to suppose that they will ever rest satisfied until the stain of these odious enactments shall be effaced from the pages of the statute-book?

I submit to every gentleman whether this is or ought to be a mere party question; whether all the representatives of the people ought not to unite as one man and declare that laws which confer this extraordinary and dangerous power upon the Executive ought to be no longer continued upon the statute-book. If time would permit, Mr. Chairman, I would like to expose at length some of the methods by which this power has been executed; but the warning already given upon the floor this afternoon admonishes me that it will be necessary to confine my remarks, if possible, within the limits prescribed by the rule.

Why, sir, one of the most serious complaints made against Charles the Second was that he exercised an undue influence over elections by means of sheriffs appointed by himself; but what are a few sheriffs in England compared with the myriads of supervisors and deputy marshals who may be appointed under this law by the executive department? In 1876 eleven thousand six hundred and fifteen special deputy marshals were appointed to attend the elections of the people, and in one instance at least as many as one hundred and fifty-five were stationed at a single polling place. Nearly six thousand supervisors were appointed to officiate at the same election. At a similar election in 1878 nearly five thousand special deputy marshals were appointed and over four thousand supervisors. Almost in every instance, at least so far as the deputy marshals were concerned, these officers were the partisans of the administration, and although they were paid for their services out of the common treasury of the people, it is a well-known fact that they contributed all in their power—and in some instances at least even to the extent of abusing their powers—to assist their party friends in choosing members of this House in political accord with the Executive. Nine of the cities to which these executive officers were sent elect twenty-seven representatives to this House every two years, a sufficient number under ordinary circumstances to control our action here upon all political matters; and yet these extraordinary laws apply to all the cities in the Union containing over twenty thousand inhabitants. It matters little to the people whether the interference in their elections is effected through the agency of the soldier with his musket or the marshal with his club. It is the interference itself, and not its mere form, of which they complain.

I cannot go into anything like a satisfactory discussion of the particular provisions contained in these statutes. It is sufficient to say generally that they authorize the appointment of special deputy marshals without limit as to number; that it is made their duty to attend the places of registration and the places of voting; to challenge any citizen whose qualifications they "may doubt," for that is the language of the statutes; and that they are authorized to arrest any citizen or any officer of a State government, with or without process, whenever they may think that the citizen or the officer has violated, or is about to violate, any law of the United States or any law of the State in relation to elections. They are sent there for the ostensible purpose of preserving what is called by the late Attorney-General "the peace of the United States;" to protect the voter before the election in his personal freedom, and to see that he is not molested before the election on account of any vote that he may be about to give, or after the election on account of any vote that he may have already given. The supervisors are authorized and empowered, by one of the sections which we now seek to repeal, to "personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district or voting precinct cast, whatever may be the indorsement on the ballot or in whatever box it may have been placed or be found;" so that if the ballots for the local State officers are deposited in separate boxes from those containing the ballots for representatives in Congress, it is made the duty of these officers to seize and open those boxes and to count the ballots contained in them. The extraordinary instructions given by the late Attorney-General Taft to the United States marshals in 1876, and which were, by a strange mingling of the civil and military authorities, promulgated through the War Department in the form of a general order, are worthy of especial notice in this connection. In those instructions among other things he said:

> In elections at which members of the House of Representatives are chosen, which by law include also elections at which the electors for President and Vice-President are appointed, the United States secure voters against whatever in general hinders or prevents them from a free exercise of the elective franchise, extending that care alike to the registration lists, the act of voting, and the personal freedom and security of the voter at all times, as well against violence on account of any vote that he may intend to give, as against conspiracy because of any that he may already have given. The peace of the United States, therefore, which you are to preserve, and whose violation you are to suppress, precedes as well as follows such elections, and protects, among others, the rights specified in the last paragraph, so that any person who by force violates those rights, breaks that peace and renders it your duty to arrest him and to suppress any riots incident or that threaten the integrity of the registration or election, to the end that the will of the people in such election may be ascertained and take effect, and that offenders may be brought before the courts for punishment.
> In this connection I advise that you, and each of your deputies, general and special, have a right to summon to your assistance, in preventing and quelling disorder, "every person in the district above fifteen years of age, whatever may be their occupation, whether civilians or not, and including the military of all denominations, militia, soldiers, marines, all of whom are alike bound to obey you. The fact that they are organized as military bodies, (whether of the State or of the United States,) under the immediate command of their own officers, does not in any wise affect their legal character. They are still the posse comitatus." I prefer to quote the above statement of the law upon this point from an opinion by my predecessor, Attorney-General Cushing, because it thus appears to have been well settled for many years. (6 Opinions, 466, May 27, 1854.)
> I need hardly add that there can be no State law or State official in this country who has jurisdiction to oppose you in discharging your official duties under the laws of the United States. If such interference shall take place, (a thing not anticipated,) you are to disregard it entirely. The laws of the United States are supreme, and so, consequently, is the action of officials of the United States in enforcing them. There is, as virtually you have already been told, no officer of a State whom you may not, by summons, embody into your own posse; and any State posse already embodied by a sheriff will, with such sheriff, be obliged, upon your summons, to become part of a United States posse, and obey you or your deputy acting virtute officii.

Without stopping now to comment at length upon this extraordinary construction of these statutes, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that they contain a clear misapplication of the opinion of Attorney-General Cushing in relation to the right of the marshals to summon a posse comitatus. It is not true that Mr. Cushing ever gave any opinion to the effect that the marshals had the right to summon either the citizen or the soldier to assist him as a posse comitatus in the performance of any duty except the execution of a process issued from the courts of the United States. No Attorney-General, so far as I know, except the one who issued these instructions, has ever decided that a marshal had power to summon a posse to assist in "preventing disorder," that is, in keeping the peace. It will be seen also that Mr. Taft claimed that it was the duty of these officers to preserve "the peace of the United States," a thing which I venture to say was never heard of until this document was promulgated. I had occasion the other day, in the discussion of another matter, to say something in relation to the respective powers of the State governments and the United States government in matters of mere police regulation, and I desire now simply to call attention to what has been said by others upon the same subject in order that their opinions may be presented to the committee in a compendious and intelligible form. A distinguished judge in Vermont, Judge Redfield, says:

> This power of the State extends to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property within the State.

Judge Cooley says:

> In the American constitutional system the power to establish the ordinary regulations of police has been left with the individual States, and cannot be assumed by the national government.

It is a power to preserve domestic order at all times and at all places within the limits of the State, and consequently it can be exercised by the State, and by the State alone, for the prevention of violence or crime, or, in other words, to keep the peace. Many years ago Mr. Justice Story, in delivering an opinion in the Supreme Court of the United States in a great leading case, said:

> To guard, however, against any possible misconstruction of our views it is proper to state that we are by no means to be understood in any manner whatsoever to doubt or to interfere with the police power belonging to the States in virtue of their general sovereignty. That police power extends over all subjects within the territorial limits of the States, and has never been conceded to the United States.

Certainly if there can ever be a time when the authority of the United States surrounds and protects one of its officers to the exclusion of all other jurisdictions it must be when he is engaged in the very act of executing a process issued from its courts. And yet the present Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court, in delivering an opinion in 1875, uses the following language:

> True it may sometimes happen that a person is amenable to both jurisdictions for one and the same act—

Meaning the jurisdiction of the State and the United States.

> Thus if a marshal of the United States is unlawfully resisted while executing the process of the courts within a State, and the resistance is accompanied by an assault on the officer, the sovereignty of the United States is violated by the resistance and that of the State by the breach of the peace in the assault.

And again, in the course of the same opinion, the Chief-Justice said:

> It is no more the duty or within the power of the United States to punish for a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder within a State than it would be to punish for false imprisonment or murder itself.

Showing clearly that in the opinion of the court a breach of the peace as such cannot constitute an offense against the government of the United States, and that it has no jurisdiction over crimes against the person committed within the limits of a State. Very different from the opinion of Mr. Taft was that of the present Secretary of State while Attorney-General under the administration of Andrew Johnson. In the letter of instructions sent by him to the United States marshal for the northern district of Florida on the 20th of August, 1868, he stated the law upon this subject as follows:

> While, however, the law gives you this "power to command all necessary assistance," and the military within your district are not exempt from obligation to obey, in common with all the citizens, your summons, in case of necessity, you will be particular to observe that this high and responsible authority is given to the marshal only in aid of his duty "to execute throughout the district all lawful precepts directed to him and issued under the authority of the United States," and only in case of necessity for this extraordinary aid. The military persons obeying this summons of the marshal will act in subordination and obedience to the civil officer, the marshal, in whose aid in the execution of process they are called, and only to the effect of securing its execution.
> The special duty and authority in the execution of process issued to you must not be confounded with the duty and authority of suppressing disorder and preserving the peace, which, under our Government, belongs to the civil authorities of the States, and not to the civil authorities of the United States. Nor are this special duty and authority of the marshal in executing process issued to him to be confounded with the authority and duty of the President of the United States in the specific cases of the Constitution and under the statutes to protect the States against domestic violence, or with his authority and duty under special statutes to employ military force in subduing combinations in resistance to the laws of the United States: for neither of these duties or authorities is shared by the subordinate officers of the Government, except when and as the same may be specifically communicated to them by the President.

This is the language of a great lawyer and a practical statesman, who understands and appreciates the character of the institutions under which he lives, and I submit it without further comment to the consideration of gentlemen who are contending here and elsewhere for the power of special deputy marshals "to keep the peace and preserve order" in a State on the day of election or any other day. They can have no such power, and any attempt to confer it upon them is simply an attempt to usurp the rightful authority of the States.

It is not possible for me to devote any considerable time to a recital of the many abuses that have been committed under this law, but I desire to say, what is known to the whole country, that at the congressional election in 1878 in the city of New York those who controlled and directed this ingenious and oppressive political machinery brought its whole force to bear with crushing effect against a single class of citizens, American citizens of foreign birth. In May, 1878, the chief supervisor of elections in that city caused one of his clerks or assistants to swear to a single complaint against ninety-three hundred persons of foreign birth, who held certificates of naturalization issued from the supreme and superior courts in 1868, and on which they had regularly registered and voted at every election since that time. On this complaint the same supervisor of elections, as clerk of the United States court, issued five thousand and four warrants, returnable before himself as commissioner of the United States court! Afterward it seems to have been discovered by this officer that these warrants were illegal by reason of the fact that the complaint contained more than one name, and thereupon they were withdrawn; but immediately afterward he caused twenty-eight hundred more complaints to be made and issued warrants upon them in the same way. Many persons were arrested under this process, and about thirty-four hundred naturalized citizens, in order to escape from this partisan persecution, actually surrendered their papers. Just a few days before the election in November he caused the same clerk or assistant to swear to thirty-two hundred more complaints. They were sworn to in packages, many of them on the Sunday preceding the election, and during the night preceding the election warrants were made out against the persons named in the complaints and placed in the hands of the supervisors of election at the various voting places, to be delivered to the deputy marshals the next morning, in order that they might be executed when the persons named in them should appear for the purpose of voting. Among the instructions given by the chief supervisor to his subordinates was the following:

> In the case of persons who present themselves to vote, where a warrant has been previously issued, you will see that such persons are arrested upon the warrant upon so presenting themselves and before voting.

This instruction was faithfully obeyed, and on the day of election hundreds of naturalized citizens who possessed all the qualifications required by the constitution and laws of the State of New York, were arrested at the polls, dragged away by these deputy marshals, and deprived of the right of suffrage. The pretense upon which these outrages were committed was that the records of naturalization kept by the superior court of New York in the year 1868 were defective and that therefore the certificates were void. The truth was that precisely the same kind of record, and no other, had been kept in that court for a period of fifteen years, under the administrations of nineteen different judges of both political parties, the Hon. Edwards Pierrepont, late minister to the court of St. James, being one of them; that between fifty and sixty thousand persons had during that time been naturalized in precisely the same manner as these persecuted men, and many of them had been voting and exercising all the other rights of citizenship without question for twenty years; and that before these arrests were made a State judge, in an able and elaborate opinion, had expressly decided that the record was sufficient and the naturalizations valid. Notwithstanding these facts, about which there can be no dispute, these nine or ten thousand persons who had in good faith procured their papers in 1868, were selected to be the victims of as vile a political conspiracy and persecution as was ever set on foot in the history of any country. Certainly no such crusade against the political rights of any class of citizens was ever before inaugurated in this country, and none ever had less excuse or justification. In some instances the papers of the citizen were seized by these federal officers when he came to register and were retained until the election was over.

The total absence of sufficient legal cause for these extraordinary proceedings is demonstrated by the admitted fact that although thousands of warrants were issued and hundreds of arrests were made, not a single conviction was ever obtained; and indeed not a single case was ever prosecuted to a final hearing. I have said that these were legally qualified voters, and a brief reference to the judgment of the United States circuit court in one of the cases will establish the truth of the statement. One of the men arrested, Peter Coleman by name, appears to have been so poor and friendless as to be unable either to procure bail or otherwise secure his release, and consequently he was thrown into jail, and in the excitement and confusion of the occasion was overlooked until some time after the election. A writ of habeas corpus was sued out and he was brought before Judge Blatchford, who after an elaborate investigation of the whole question discharged him from imprisonment. To show that his case was the same as the cases of the others, and that they were also legal voters, I read some brief extracts from the opinion. In the course of his opinion the judge says:

> It is not claimed that between the end of 1858 and the beginning of 1874 any other form of order admitting to citizenship was made by the superior court in any case, different from what now appears to have been made in the case of Coleman, while it does appear that during all the time from 1858 to 1874 the form of the order of admission was the same as in the case of Coleman, (except that nothing appears as to any initials of a judge,) and that such form covers the cases of between fifty thousand and sixty thousand persons, who appear by the books of that court before mentioned to have been admitted by that court during that period to be citizens, if Coleman was so admitted.

And then further on he says:

> That court, for a period of fifteen years, observed the same form of procedure, and kept the same records, and made the same orders of admission in all cases of naturalization as in the case of Coleman, and none other. During that period nineteen judges occupied seats on the bench of that court. They were Joseph S. Bosworth, Murray Hoffman, John Slosson, Lewis B. Woodruff, Edwards Pierrepont, James Moncrief, Anthony L. Robertson, James W. White, John M. Barbour, Claudius L. Monell, Samuel B. Garvin, John H. McCunn, Samuel Jones, Freeman J. Fithian, John J. Freedman, James C. Spencer, William E. Curtis, John Sedgwick, and Hooper C. Van Vorst. It is to be presumed that, in each case of naturalization during that time, a certificate was given like in form to that received by Coleman, and averring that the court had ordered the admission of the party. That series of judges must have regarded what was found on the files or in the records or books of the court in each case as an order of admission or as a record showing that such an order had been made by the court. The stipulation of facts states that in the case of each person whose name is entered in the book as naturalized, there are on file papers resembling in all respects those in the case of Coleman.

And finally, after an able discussion of the law and the facts involved in the case, he says:

> It therefore appears that Coleman was duly and legally admitted to citizenship; and that the legality of his admission was not invalidated by any act or omission which occurred either prior or subsequently to his admission. As he was legally admitted, it was proper for the court to give him the certificate of citizenship, which was given to him; and that certificate was not unlawfully issued or made. On this ground he is entitled to his discharge from arrest.

Now, sir, if Coleman was a qualified voter so were all the others, unless it can be shown that in some material respect their cases were different from his. That there was no such difference I think may be fairly assumed from the facts that the complaints and warrants were all alike, all being printed forms, alleging the same offense in the same language, and that there was not a solitary conviction secured on any of them.

The evidence taken by a committee of this House during the last Congress and reported in Miscellaneous Document No. 23, shows that about ninety-five hundred persons who were naturalized in the superior court in 1868, registered and votedin the city of New York at the election in 1876, but the result of the system of intimidation inaugurated and carried on by the chief supervisor of elections and his subordinates was that only twelve hundred and forty such persons voted at the congressional election in 1878. It is therefore almost self-evident that about eight thousand voters, nearly all of whom were democrats, were illegally deprived of the right of suffrage in a single city at that election. When these eight thousand men voted the party of the Executive had but one representative on this floor from that city; but after they have been driven or dragged away from the ballot-box, it has three—I make no further comment.

But, Mr. Chairman, when a law itself is vicious or unconstitutional, as I believe these laws are, the mere manner of their administration is a matter of secondary importance. No method of administration can sanctify a bad law, or reconcile its victims to its continued enforcement. There is no remedy but repeal.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CARLISLE. Certainly, if the gentlemen desires to ask a question.

Mr. FRYE. I simply wish to say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] that I do not agree to the correctness of all the statements which he has just been making relative to naturalization and the conduct of elections in New York. I will not interrupt him now to make the correction, as his time is limited, but I hope to have an opportunity to explain the matter at some future time. I simply desire that his statements shall not go unchallenged to a certain extent.

Mr. CARLISLE. I hope the gentleman will have that opportunity, and I am very sorry that I have not now the opportunity to go more fully into that matter. I have made but a hasty and imperfect statement of it.

Mr. FRYE. I will not interrupt the gentleman now, because his time is so limited.

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Chairman, passing from the consideration of the particular provisions of these laws, and from the methods which have been adopted in their execution, I propose to examine the constitutional authority of Congress to enact them.

The gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] in the discussion of the army bill a week or so ago, appears to have discovered a new source of congressional power over the subject of elections; and, in order that his position may be stated in his own language, I will read it. After quoting a clause from the constitution, which I shall presently read, the gentleman said:

> The right to vote for the most numerous branch of the legislature is given by the States. The qualifications are made by the States. The United States does not confer the right of suffrage upon those individuals, but it adopts to its right of suffrage, and takes as its voters a class which have already the right of suffrage given to it by the States; it makes them its voters for the election of its officers.

I suppose the gentleman means that the members of this House are officers of the United States, a proposition which I deny, and which could be easily refuted if it were material to this discussion to go into that question. He proceeds to say—

> And if it does its duty it is bound to guarantee to them a free and fair election.

The provision of the constitution which the gentleman from New Jersey thus construes is the first clause of the second section of the first article, and reads as follows:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

There is certainly, to say the least of it, great plausibility and much apparent force in the position taken by the gentleman; and the fact that it is a new discovery is by no means conclusive that he is not correct. I call the attention of the gentleman, in order that we may consider the question in all of its aspects, to some other provisions in the constitution immediately following, and bearing upon the same general subject.

The first clause of the third section of the same article provides as follows:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each senator shall have one vote.

In the next clause is found the following provision:

If vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

These are all the provisions of the constitution relating to the elections or appointments of representatives and senators in Congress, except one which will be noticed hereafter in another connection if my time will permit.

The right and duty to guarantee and protect a citizen or an officer in the exercise of a right, necessarily involves the power to determine at the time the guarantee is made effectual, whether he actually possesses the right in question or not, because it is impossible legally to secure a man in the exercise of a right without first ascertaining in some way that it belongs to him. It is admitted by the gentleman that the several States prescribe the qualifications of voters; but if the federal authority shall undertake to enforce the right to vote and preserve the purity of the ballot-box, it must, of course, by some officer or agent, either before or at the time of the election, decide who possesses those qualifications; that is, it must by some means of its own separate the spurious from the genuine voters, and admit the one while it excludes the other. It must inquire into the voter's age, his residence, his citizenship, and his qualifications as to education and property, if such tests are prescribed by the constitution or laws of the State. But if the United States must exercise all these powers in the discharge of the supposed duty to enforce and protect the right of the citizen to vote for representatives, so it must exercise the same or similar powers in the discharge of a like duty to enforce and protect the right of members of a State legislature to vote for senators, and to protect the governor of a State in the exercise of his constitutional right to fill vacancies by appointment; for I submit to the gentleman that if, under the first clause of the second section, the United States has adopted as its voters those persons in the State who possess the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature, and is therefore bound to protect them in the exercise of the right of suffrage, the first clause of the third section also adopts the members of the legislature as electors of senators, and there is the same obligation precisely to protect them against bribery, intimidation, and other improper influences in casting their votes. I submit also whether, in the same sense, the next clause read has not adopted the governors of the various States as the agents or electors of the United States to temporarily fill vacancies in the Senate, and whether exactly the same federal duties do not result in that case as in the others.

Mr. ROBESON. I hope to have an opportunity hereafter to answer the gentleman.

Mr. CARLISLE. Certainly; I hope the gentleman will have such an opportunity afforded to him. It follows, Mr. Chairman, from what I have said that if the gentleman's position is correct the United States, in the discharge of this supposed duty, must not only place its officers at the polls to decide upon the qualifications of the citizen when he offers to vote for a representative, but it must, if necessary, place them in the halls of the State legislatures to examine the credentials and determine the qualifications of members who offer to vote for senators and to exclude those who are adjudged not to possess the right. This is the point to which the gentleman's argument logically leads him. Is he prepared to maintain it? Is he prepared to assert that Congress has authority, under these provisions of the constitution, to provide for the supervision and control of every election at which the people choose representatives and the legislature chooses senators? It seems to me that the simple statement of the gentleman's proposition and its logical consequences constitutes its best refutation.

Briefly stated, this is my first objection to the position of the gentleman. I do not choose, however, to rest my opposition to it solely upon this reductio ad absurdum. I choose rather to place it upon the broad ground that there is not in any of the provisions to which attention has been called any delegation of power to Congress or to any department or officer of the government over the voter, or over the elective franchise, or over the subject of elections.

We will not disagree upon the proposition that this is a government of delegated powers exclusively. We will not d sagree upon the resulting proposition that it is a government which possesses no inherent powers; but that whenever it attempts to exercise an authority over any subject it must find a warrant for it either in some express grant or in some reasonable implication from an express grant in the constitution itself. Before any gentleman is authorized to assert that it is the duty of the government to protect any right of the citizen he must show that it has been clothed with the power to do so. There can be no duty imposed where there is no power delegated. Congress may, by the terms of the constitution, make all laws that may be necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers vested in it by that instrument, or in any department or officer of the government; but the power must be vested, delegated, conferred, before the law can be made. There is no pretense of a grant or delegation of power in the clauses under consideration. The most that can be properly said of them is that they recognize or describe a certain class of citizens who are entitled to vote for representatives and a certain body of men in the State entitled to choose senators.

Will any gentleman contend that a power to enforce and protect the right of suffrage arises or results from a mere recognition of the right in the constitution? The doctrine upon which such a claim rests has been refuted so often that it has long since passed beyond the field of controversy. In the great body of fundamental law resulting from judicial construction of the constitution no rule is more firmly established than that those rights, privileges, and immunities of the citizen, which are simply recognized in that instrument, must depend for their protection upon the several States. For instance, liberty of conscience, the right to maintain a free press, the freedom of speech, the right of the people to peaceably assemble for a lawful purpose, the right to bear arms, and many other important and valuable rights of the citizen, are expressly recognized in the constitution; but Congress has no power whatever to legislate for their protection. The State governments protect them, and so they must protect the right of suffrage. They confer that right upon the citizen; they alone prescribe the qualifications necessary for its exercise, and they alone must decide for themselves whether these qualifications do or do not exist in each particular case, subject, of course, to the right of this House to determine who is or who is not a lawful voter when it exercises the power to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. This right of the States to interpret and apply their own constitutions and their own laws in respect to suffrage as well as other matters, in the first instance, is one which they cannot surrender without an abandonment of the whole ground upon which they stand as component and essential parts of the federal Union.

The right of the citizen of one State to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States, is a right not only recognized but created by the constitution. If there had been no such compact of government entered into by the States and people, this right of the citizen of the State of Ohio, for instance, to enjoy all the privileges and immunities of citizenship in the State of Illinois would not have existed; but will any gentleman contend that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to enact laws to protect that right? Clearly not, for the obvious reason that there is no grant of legislative power coupled with the constitutional recognition of the right, and it is left solely under the protection of the several States and the federal judiciary. If a State should enact any law or adopt any regulation impairing or abridging the right, by means of discriminations against citizens of other States in matters embraced within the scope of the constitutional provision, the courts would hold such laws and regulations to be null and void. No law of Congress has been or can be passed upon the subject, nor is any necessary.

Again, the constitution gives to each State, as against the other States, the right to reclaim a fugitive from its justice. This, like the right just mentioned, is one which would not have existed at all except for the express provision in the fundamental law of the Union. In the absence of such a provision no State would have been bound by any legal obligation to surrender the person of a fugitive criminal upon the demand of another State, although it might have done so if it chose as a mere matter of comity. The Second Congress which assembled under the Constitution had occasion to act upon and to construe that clause. No member of that distinguished body of lawyers and statesmen supposed that it conferred upon Congress the power to pass laws for the purpose of enforcing the right conferred by that provision of the constitution. They simply prescribed the manner in which the requisition should be made in such cases by the executive of one State upon the executive of another, and then left it to the several States themselves to provide the necessary means, by legislation or otherwise, for the enforcement of the right. In a somewhat celebrated case, where the governor of the State of Ohio had refused to comply with a requisition made upon him in due form of law by the governor of Kentucky, the Supreme Court of the United States was called upon to consider this clause and the legislation of Congress under it, and it said, speaking of the act of February 12, 1793:

The act does not provide any means to compel the execution of this duty, nor inflict any punishment for neglect or refusal on the part of the executive of the State; nor is there any clause or provision in the Constitution which arms the Government of the United States with this power. Indeed, such a power would place every State under the control and dominion of the General Government, even in the administration of its internal concerns and reserved rights. And we think it clear that the Federal Government under the Constitution has no power to impose on a State officer, as such, any duty whatever and compel him to perform it; for if it possessed this power, it might overload the officer with duties, which would fill up all his time and disable him from performing his obligations to the State, and might impose on him duties of a character incompatible with the rank and dignity to which he was elevated by the State.

It is not necessary to consume time in commenting upon this decision, except to say that it disposes of two important questions involved in this discussion: first, that Congress cannot legislate without an express or implied grant of power, even when the constitution has expressly created or distinctly recognized a right; and, secondly, that the general government cannot impose duties upon a State officer, as such, and compel him to discharge them, as the laws now under consideration plainly undertake to do.

Mr. Chairman, I might go further into this branch of the subject and show many other instances in which the rights of citizens have been clearly and distinctly recognized, and yet, for the want of a delegation of power to enforce and protect them, Congress cannot constitutionally legislate for that purpose.

Here is a recognition of the right of a certain class of people, to be fixed by the State constitution and the State laws, to vote for representatives in Congress, but there is no delegation of power to enforce that right, and consequently it cannot be done except by the States. If any man who belongs to that class is denied the right of suffrage at an election for representatives, he has his individual remedy in the courts of justice, and this House, in the exercise of its exclusive power to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, will redress the public wrong. No permanent injury can be done either to the individual citizen or to the public at large, because, without congressional legislation, there is ample power to right every wrong. There is power in the State legislatures, in the State and federal courts, and in this House to secure to every citizen the free and unobstructed enjoyment of the elective franchise, and this is the true character and full measure of the protection which the framers of the constitution designed he should have.

Passing from this, the next clause under which the authority to enact these election laws is claimed is the fourth section of the first article of the constitution, which reads as follows:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing senators.

Before proceeding to discuss the character and extent of the power conferred by this clause, I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the election laws now under consideration do not purport to have been passed under the authority conferred by this provision of the constitution. They do not purport, either in their titles or in their general scope and design, to be laws regulating the times, places, or manner of holding elections for representatives. They were passed as laws "to enforce and protect the rights of the citizens of the several States of this Union to vote." It seems to have been supposed by their authors that the authority was derived from some of the late amendments to the constitution.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] permit me to make a remark?

Mr. CARLISLE. If the gentleman does not consume too much of my time.

Mr. REED. Does not the gentleman from Kentucky know that in the debate when the main portions of these provisions were passed this authority was expressly claimed for the constitutionality of the proposed measures?

Mr. CARLISLE. It was so claimed by some of the gentlemen who participated in the discussion.

Mr. REED. By Mr. Lawrence, of Ohio.

Mr. CARLISLE. But my recollection is very distinct that Mr. Bingham, of Ohio, who reported the measure in February, 1871, claimed that these laws could be passed by virtue of some inherent power in the general government to protect its own existence. I may be mistaken about that; but if the gentleman will refer to the debate, I think he will find my statement substantially correct.

Mr. REED. The gentleman is mistaken simply in this: what he states was the reason which Mr. Bingham, of Ohio, gave for the provision in the constitution; that is, the right to self-preservation on the part of the government.

Mr. CARLISLE. My memory may be at fault on this particular point. Now, Mr. Chairman, it must be admitted that the language of this provision of the constitution is very broad when it declares that—

> Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing senators.

I differ from one of the gentlemen from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS,] who addressed the committee yesterday afternoon, and who stated that this clause, taken altogether, was a delegation of power both to the general government and to the States. It is not in my opinion a delegation of power to the States. If the fourth section, which I have just read, had been omitted entirely from the constitution, it would have followed that after a House of Representatives had been established, and after it had been provided that its members should be elected by the people, the States would have controlled the whole subject of elections for two very obvious reasons: first, because in the absence of that section there would have been no delegation of power whatever to Congress over the subject; and secondly—which is more conclusive if possible than the first reason—there could not possibly have been a Congress in existence to make any regulation upon the subject until the States had first acted and sent their representatives. So that this provision is not a delegation of authority to the States, but is a delegation of authority to the government of the United States, or rather to the Congress of the United States, to do certain things in regard to these elections.

The first part of the clause, instead of being a delegation of power, is a mandatory provision, making it the imperative duty of the State legislatures to enact laws regulating the times, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives. The second is a delegation of authority to the Congress of the United States at any time to make or alter those regulations, except as to the place of choosing senators. I shall not enter at large into the argument which has already been made by more than one gentleman on the floor, as to what was the real meaning of the framers of the constitution as to the circumstances under which this power might be exercised. If the language of the instrument were really ambiguous, we would be authorized, and it would be necessary, to go back and examine the debates and proceedings in the federal convention and in the State conventions for the purpose of determining its actual meaning. But the language appears to be free from all ambiguity. The words "at any time" would seem necessarily to confer upon Congress the right to decide for itself when and under what circumstances it should interpose by legislation to make regulations or alter the regulations previously made by the States. But in my opinion a proper regard for the spirit in which that provision was proposed by the convention and adopted by the States, and the well-known purpose for which it was inserted, should prevent the exercise of the power, whatever its extent may be, except under extraordinary circumstances endangering the very existence of the legislative department; and I think that the writings and speeches of Madison, Hamilton, and other advocates of the constitution, show very clearly that this was their view of the subject.

I know that Mr. Douglas and many other gentlemen of distinction have held that this power of Congress is a dependent or contingent one, that it can be exercised only in those cases where the States have wholly failed or refused to make these regulations, or have made such unreasonable regulations as to defeat the election of members of Congress. In 1842, when Congress enacted for the first time a law requiring the members of the House to be elected from districts composed of contiguous territory, the question as to the real nature and extent of this power came directly before this body in a form which compelled a decision. The legislatures of a large majority of the States of the Union, New York, Ohio, and Illinois among them, passed resolutions declaring that the law of Congress was unconstitutional and void; but all the States except four, New Hampshire, Mississippi, Georgia, and Missouri, enacted statutes creating congressional districts. These four States refused to do so, and sent their representatives here chosen upon a general ticket in accordance with their own laws. The question was thus directly presented to the House whether that act of Congress was constitutional, because if so the persons chosen had not been elected in accordance with law and were not entitled to their seats. After a long and able debate the House by a vote of 128 to 68 declared that the law was unconstitutional and void and that the four States were entitled to their representation upon this floor. Among those who voted in the affirmative to admit the representatives were Stephen A. Douglas, Hannibal Hamlin, John P. Hale, Andrew Johnson, Thomas H. Seymour, and many other gentlemen of distinction in that day, some of whom are still living. The view which the House then took of this subject can be best expressed perhaps in the language of the report made by Mr. Douglas from the committee on elections. After an examination of the proceedings in the federal convention and in the several State conventions called to ratify the constitution, the report says:

> From this brief review of the history and contemporaneous exposition of this portion of the constitution, it is evident that the convention which formed and the people who ratified that great charter of our liberties, intended that the regulation of the times, places, and manner of holding the elections should be left exclusively to the legislatures of the several States, subject to the condition only that Congress might alter the State regulations or make new ones in the event that the States should refuse to act in the premises or should legislate in such a manner as would subvert the rights of the people to a free and fair representation.

I am not prepared, in view of the broad and explicit language of the constitution, to go quite that far upon the naked question of power, although, as already stated, I think it was never contemplated that the power should be exercised except under the circumstances and necessities stated in this report. I am willing to assume, for the purposes of this argument at least, that Congress has the power at any time and under all circumstances—whether the States have legislated or not, and although they may have adopted reasonable, wise, and just regulations upon this subject—to make or alter regulations as to the "times, places, and manner of holding elections." That is the language of the constitution, and whether it suits our individual and party purposes or not, we must adhere to it and construe it as it stands.

It is essential, Mr. Chairman, to all intelligent discussion, and especially to an intelligent discussion of grave constitutional questions affecting the sovereign power of legislation over a subject of such vital importance as the elective franchise, to have correct definitions of terms, and to use the proper terms. We must adhere to the very words of the instrument itself and not substitute our own in their places. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] departed somewhat from this rule when he stated in his remarks the other day that this was a power to regulate the manner of "choosing representatives" and made that supposed power the basis of his argument in support of these election laws——

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. McKINLEY and Mr. WARNER moved that by unanimous consent the gentleman be allowed to proceed beyond his time; and there being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. CARLISLE. I thank the gentlemen, and will endeavor to repay the courtesy of the committee by condensing my remarks as much as possible.

What, then, is the extent of the power conferred upon Congress? What does it enable Congress to do with reference to elections for representatives and senators, for it applies to both alike, except as to the place of choosing senators? The power is limited and defined by the very terms of the grant, and cannot, without a violation of the well-established rules of construction in such cases, be extended beyond the ordinary import of the words employed; and this rule is especially applicable in such a case as this, where the primary power over the subject is lodged in another jurisdiction. It is not a power to regulate the whole manner or mode of electing representatives, or of choosing representatives, as the gentleman from Connecticut stated it the other day. That might imply some measure of authority or control over the persons who are to make the election—some right or duty to designate who shall and who shall not participate in the election. Nor is it a power to provide generally for holding such elections. That might possibly also carry with it, if not inconsistent with some other constitutional provision, the right to do whatever might be necessary to ascertain, by a system of registration or otherwise, who are qualified voters, to secure the elective franchise to all who are entitled to it, and to inflict punishment upon all who wrongfully exercise it. But no such incidental powers can result from this narrow and restricted grant, as I shall endeavor to show before concluding.

The framers of our constitution were distinguished above all the men of their time for their skill and accuracy in the use of language; they knew the exact meaning of every word they employed, and they understood thoroughly the effect of every provision they inserted in that instrument. Whenever they intended to confer upon Congress complete powers of legislation over an entire subject they did so in appropriate terms. For instance, when they intended to confer upon Congress the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, and imposts, to regulate commerce, to establish post-offices and post-roads, and to coin money, they did not declare simply that it should have the power to regulate the manner of doing these things. On the contrary, they provided in clear and explicit terms, without qualification or limitation, that it should have the power to do the very things themselves; and such a delegation of authority carried with it, of course, the implied power to do whatever might be necessary and proper to accomplish the objects intended. Such a grant confers full power to legislate over the whole subject and over all its incidents. It gives the right to appropriate money, to impose fines and penalties, to create offices, and to establish and maintain all the political machinery and appliances that may be necessary to a complete execution of the power.

But it will require very little argument, I presume, to show that a power merely to regulate the manner of doing a thing does not extend to the very substance and vital part of the subject, and especially when the subject itself is left, in the first place, under the jurisdiction and control of another authority. Now, this is all that was done by the framers of the constitution when they came to deal with the subject of elections, a subject which properly belongs to the several States, and which affects to a great extent the elective franchise in the hands of the citizens. They provided that Congress should simply possess the power to regulate the "manner of holding" them; not the power to legislate upon the whole subject as in the other instances I have mentioned; not the power to regulate the exercise of the elective franchise by appointing officers to judge of the qualifications of voters and admit or exclude them at pleasure; but a mere power to determine in what manner the election itself shall be held or conducted. Such a power relates only to the form, the mode, the method of carrying on or holding the election, leaving everything else connected with the subject untouched.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me for a moment?

Mr. CARLISLE. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. Did not Patrick Henry in his assault upon the provision of the constitution touching this question admit it went beyond that, and say Congress might give one gentleman one vote, or one hundred, and deny it to others? Did not Mr. Madison explain that where the State regulations made suffrage unequal Congress might make it equal, and point to the case of the city of Charleston?

Mr. CARLISLE. In the first place, it cannot in any proper sense be said that Patrick Henry admitted anything in relation to this subject, because he was opposed to the constitution; but he charged certain things which the friends of the constitution denied. Mr. Madison never said, and I am sure my friend from Pennsylvania cannot cite such a declaration from him, that the general government would, under any circumstances, have the power to regulate the right of suffrage itself. I know what Mr. Madison said in reply to Mr. Monroe, and although unable at this instant to quote his exact language from memory, I am very sure he did not state what the gentleman from Pennsylvania alleges.

Mr. KELLEY. I think the gentleman will find that Mr. Madison, in reply to an interrogatory put to him by Mr. Monroe, clearly and fully admitted the right of Congress to regulate suffrage in elections for United States officers.

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Madison said this:

> Should the people of any State by any means be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the general government.

That is the exact language of Mr. Madison, and it is, I suppose, the declaration to which the gentleman alludes. Taken in connection with the subject upon which he was speaking, its obvious meaning is, that if the State should deprive the citizen of his right of suffrage by its failure or refusal to make regulations as to the times, places, and manner of holding elections for representatives, it could be remedied by the general government; and this I admit.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me I will give him that language a little more fully

Mr. CARLISLE. Not now. Mr. Chairman, when interrupted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania I was endeavoring to show that this was not a delegation of plenary power over the whole subject of elections, and all its incidents, but that it was a narrow, restricted power to make or alter regulations merely respecting the manner of holding them. Very similar language to that employed in the clause now under consideration is used in another part of the constitution, and its practical construction, acquiesced in ever since the organization of the government, strongly supports my position. The first section of the fourth article, after declaring that full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State, provides:

> And the Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and judicial proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof.

Here, then, as in the case of elections, is a power conferred upon Congress to prescribe the "manner" in which a certain thing shall be done. The power is as complete and comprehensive in the one case as in the other. In neither does it extend to the actual performance of the very function or act itself, but only to the mode or method of performing it. The first Congress that assembled after the adoption of the constitution, a Congress composed largely of men who, as members of the federal convention or of the State conventions, had assisted in framing and adopting the constitution, enacted a law for the purpose of carrying into execution the power delegated by the clause just read; but it does not seem to have been supposed by these men, familiar as they were with the plan and scope of the constitution and the meaning of its several provisions, that they had power, under this clause, to provide for the actual proof or authentication of the records and public acts of the States, to provide for the appointment of officers of the federal government to make the certifications, or to supervise them, or to impose fines and forfeitures upon the officers of the State for their acts or omissions concerning that matter. On the contrary, the act of May 20, 1790, is a strict and literal execution of the constitutional power according to the plain and obvious import of the terms in which it was conferred. It simply prescribes the "manner" in which they shall be authenticated, and leaves the authentication itself to be made by the State authorities without interference or control by any officer or agent of the general government.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not undertake to say, because according to my view of the character of the laws under consideration it is not necessary for me to say in this debate, precisely how far Congress might properly go in legislating under the power to make or alter regulations respecting the "manner of holding" elections. By the act of July 25, 1866, it has prescribed the time and manner of holding elections for senators, but it sent no federal officers to conduct the elections or to oversee the State authorities by whom they are conducted. By the nineteenth section of the act of February 28, 1871, it provided that all votes for representatives shall be by written or printed ballots; and by the act of February 2, 1872, it required representatives to be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants; but in none of these provisions is there any attempt to impose penalties upon the citizen or upon the officer of the State for a failure to conform to their requirements. If the vote of the citizen is not cast by written or printed ballot, it will not be counted; if the representatives are not chosen by districts, they will not be admitted. In both cases the remedy is applied here in the execution of the power of the House to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. These three acts appear to be legitimate exercises of the power, but I confidently submit to gentlemen upon the other side that the laws which we now propose to repeal are of an entirely different character, and cannot be justified upon any rational construction of the constitution or upon any proper theory of our State and federal systems of government.

The power is to "make" or to "alter" regulations as to the manner of holding elections. These laws do neither; they do not make any new regulations as to the manner of holding the elections, nor do they alter any such regulations previously made by the States. They do not make or alter any regulations respecting the manner in which the votes shall be cast, or the manner in which they shall be received, or recorded, or certified. On the contrary, every law and regulation
